Defendants frankly concede that the improvements have not produced immediate results commensurate with the amounts of the assessments, and that as to certain of the lots the assessments are confiscatory, and that justice requires that a reassessment be made by reducing the amounts thereof. It is their claim that, even conceding the assessments to be void, the provisions of the Improvement Act are unequivocal, and that they insure a reassessment under the circumstances of the case. In this position they are joined by certain amici curiæ, including the legal representatives of the city of Los Angeles, who assert that city is vitally concerned in the question because of the fact that it has, through its board of pension commissioners, invested several millions of dollars in improvement bonds issued under reassessments of its fire and police pension funds, and such funds will be jeopardized if a reassessment is denied under the facts of this case.

Plaintiffs claim that a reassessment may not be had for the reason that the board had no jurisdiction to order the work. They argue that, if a reassessment can be had under the circumstances here presented, then any protest is but an idle act.

[1] We are of the opinion that the statutory mandate compels a reassessment to be had, and that this is so, regardless of the fact that the proceedings from which the original assessment came were without jurisdiction. We will not, therefore, discuss the validity of any of the proceedings leading up to the assessment, as these questions, considering our conclusion, become moot. With the wisdom or justice of the rule requiring a reassessment where the work has been performed we are not here concerned, as the statute requiring a reassessment is clear, specific and mandatory. The provisions of the statute prescribed for making the reassessment constitute an independent proceeding which rests on the basis of benefits arising inevitably from the existence of a completed improvement. Our statute upon the subject is emphatic and all-embracive upon the subject. Section 28 of the Improvement Act, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 118, § 7), reads as follows: "Whenever any assessment heretofore issued or which may be hereafter issued is or shall be void, or unenforceable, for any cause * * * then, in any of such events a reassessment therefor may be issued. The true intent and meaning of this section is to make the cost and expense of work or improvement made through an attempted compliance with this act, payable by the real estate benefited by such work or improvement by making a reassessment therefor. * * * A reassessment shall be ordered under any one of three circumstances: * * * Third—Whenever any court of competent jurisdiction in any suit to set aside the lien of any assessment or of any bond representing any assessment, * * * or bond shall in its judgment decree such assessments or bonds to be void, or unenforceable, then it shall in and by its decree direct the making of a reassessment to cover the assessments involved in such suit. * * *"

It will thus be seen that, by the express provisions of the statute, a reassessment issues, regardless of the fact that the proceedings from which the original assessment came were without jurisdiction, and the court must under such circumstances direct in the same decree the making of a reassessment to cover the assessments involved in the suit.

[2, 3] Plaintiffs raise the objection that the statute is unconstitutional. A statute authorizing another assessment for the same improvement is not objectionable as setting aside a pre-existing judgment declaring a former assessment invalid. Under the unlimited exercise of authority on questions of tax or assessments, the Legislature in the first instance could have provided that the work should be done without the requirement of any kind of a petition or without any provision for a protest. Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 8 S. Ct. 921, 31 L. Ed. 763. The rule is well established that the mere fact that a judgment of a court has pronounced an assessment void will not preclude the Legislature from making provision for a reassessment on such property if it had the original power to provide for such assessment.

[4-9] Reassessment statutes have been uniformly upheld as constitutional where the consent of the property owner required by statute is lacking. Jones v. Town of Tonawanda, 158 N. Y. 438, 53 N. E. 280. So also, where a remonstrance was ignored. Kansas City v. Silver, 74 Kan. 851, 85 P. 805; Frederick v. City of Seattle, 13 Wash. 428, 43 P. 364; Page and Jones on Taxation, vol. 2, § 962. There is no fundamental obligation that the consent or acquiescence of the taxed property owners be obtained at all. Nottage v. City of Portland, 35 Or. 539, 58 P. 883, 76 Am. St. Rep. 513; Blount v. City of Janesville, 31 Wis. 648; City of Elkins v. Harper, 82 W. Va. 377, 95 S. E. 1033. Neither is it necessary that there should have been due notice or even a hearing in the original proceeding. Nor does it make any difference that the owners of the property affected by the assessment made objection to the original proceedings as they progressed. The matter of remonstrance against a proposed work or the obtaining of a sufficient initial petition are not matters affecting the right to reassessment. Brown v. City of Silverton, 97 Or. 441, 190 P. 971, where the authorities are extensively discussed. See, also, Bellingham Bay, etc., Co. v. New Whatcom, 172 U. S. 314, 19 S. Ct. 205, 43 L. Ed. 460. The matter of giving property owners any right of protest whatsoever against a proposed improvement is purely a statutory concession. There is no constitutional requirement that this be done. A reassessment is an independent proceeding in itself. It provides its own notice and gives its own hearing. It rests upon the taxation power for its support, and all questions relative to it are solely legislative, except the single one as to whether the reassessment act gives due notice. The basis for a particular reassessment is the existence of a completed improvement, which is of a kind for which a special assessment might properly have been laid, but where the attempted assessment falls for any cause. There can be no question that the Legislature intended that a reassessment should be made in every instance where the work had actually been completed and an assessment had been filed. The positive statutory provision cannot be evaded. The phrase "any cause" includes jurisdictional defects, and in fact any cause that could work the result in question. The exercise of the taxing power can be limited only by constitutional restriction, and here, as stated, there is none. All the authorities go to the extent of deciding that courts cannot inquire into the policy of the tax, or undertake to limit the authority of the Legislature, so long as it is exercised within constitutional limitations, and so long as it appears that it is a proper exercise of the taxing power. Nottage

v. City of Portland, supra; Richman v. Board of Supervisors, etc., 77 Iowa, 513, 42 N. W. 422, 4 L. R. A. 445, 14 Am. St. Rep. 308; Kansas City v. Silver, supra.

[10-12] The purpose of the reassessment act is that land benefited by an authorized public work shall not escape the payment of its proportionate share of the expense thereof. The essentials of jurisdiction to order a reassessment are that a public improvement has been made, that an assessment has been imposed or attempted, and that payment thereof has not been had. There is a moral obligation resting upon the property owners benefited by the improvement and an equitable right against the property itself, which the Legislature has power to legalize and enforce. Getty v. City of Syracuse, 129 Kan. 106, 281 P. 883. The California decisions uphold this view. Ferry v. O'Brien, 188 Cal. 629, 206 P. 449; Hall v. Fairchild-Gilmore-Wilton Co., 66 Cal. App. 615, 227 P. 649; California Land Co. v. Town of Corte Madera, 97 Cal. App. 393, 275 P. 866. These cases are based upon the decision of Seattle v. Kelleher, 195 U. S. 351, 25 S. Ct. 44, 49 L. Ed. 232, which is cited and discussed at length in the Ferry Case, supra, together with the case of Voigt v. Detroit City, 184 U. S. 115, 22 S. Ct. 337, 46 L. Ed. 459. These authorities squarely hold that the basis of the tax is the existence of a completed work, and upon this basis the Legislature may proceed as it sees fit, since its power to that end is unrestricted so long as a hearing is given upon the matter of fixing the amount of the reassessment itself. The objections, therefore, that the act is unconstitutional, and that the original proceedings were not conducted fairly, there being a departure from the statutory requirements, can avail plaintiffs nothing, where, as here, the work has been performed and a reassessment is to be made. Schneider Granite Co. v. Gast Realty & Investment Co., 245 U. S. 288, 38 S. Ct. 125, 62 L. Ed. 292.

[13] Respondents present the further argument that, even conceding a reassessment to be mandatory, it could only apply to the lands involved in this suit, and therefore there could be no possible change in the situation here presented. But a reassessment is not limited or confined to the lands embraced in the original assessment, but, if justice demands, it may be upon an enlarged district where benefits accrue. Stats. 1923, p. 119; Cline v. City of Seattle, 13 Wash. 444, 43 P. 367; People v. Judson, 233 Ill. 280, 281, 84 N. E. 233; State ex rel. v. District Court of Ramsey County, 95 Minn. 503, 104 N. W. 553; Eggerth v. City of Spokane, 91 Wash. 221, 157 P. 859; Schneider Granite Co. v. Gast Realty Co., supra. In levying a reassessment, all lands benefited by the improvement may be included though originally omitted. The improvements here involved were, as heretofore stated, performed under a district plan. The improvement is of a through street which may benefit large areas at either end of it.

[14] Then, again, certain school lands were omitted from the assessment on the theory that they were not taxable. The ground of omission was contrary to the express provisions of the statute. Improvement Act of 1911, § 20g (added 1929), Stats. 1929, p. 1658.

[15] A portion of the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railway Company lying in the street was also omitted upon the same theory. In levying an assessment for street improvements in a certain district, a city has the authority to assess railroad property in the district which is used as a part of the general system of the railroad, where the method is the same as that employed in assessing other lands in the district. Rutledge v. City of Eureka, 195 Cal. 404, 234 P. 82; McNeil v. City of South Pasadena, 166 Cal. 153, 135 P. 32, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 138; Southern Pacific R. R. Co. v. Stibbens, 103 Cal. App. 664, 285 P. 374; Los Angeles Pacific Co. v. Hubbard, 17 Cal. App. 646, 121 P. 306.

In conclusion it may again be stated that the reassessment may attach to all the property found to be benefited by the improvement, whether included in the original district or not. The judgment of the court below, in so far as it declares invalid the assessment as made against the properties of plaintiffs upon the ground that it is confiscatory, is affirmed; in other respects said judgment is reversed.

SHENK, J.

I concur in the judgment and the legal conclusions on which it is based. But I do so reluctantly because the result is a plain indication that the rights of the property owners have by the Legislature, supported by the opinion, just about been reduced to nothing. The theory of our laws imposing upon property owners the obligation to pay for paving proceedings has been and is that they shall have some voice in determining whether the work shall be done. Now apparently they have none. The proceedings may now be initiated without their consent or the opportunity to object thereto, and, however irregular the conduct thereof, even to the extent of entire invalidity, and even though their property was not included within the assessment district, such property may now be brought in and subjected to an assessment. They should be accorded some rights under the statute. It seems to me highly desirable that the Legislature take the necessary steps to accord the property owners some voice in these in invitum proceedings and adequately to safeguard the rights so accorded, since the courts under present law are powerless to afford an adequate remedy for obvious abuses.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mariposa County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Application by Abner B. Baker for the probate of the will of William Lances, also known as Billy Lances, deceased. From an order admitting the will to probate, John Brown, contestant, appeals.

Reversed.

For prior opinion, see 6 P.(2d) 572.

C. A. Degnan, of Fresno, Vincent S. Brown, of San Francisco, and S. P. Galvin, of Merced, for appellant.

H. H. Carleton, of Mariposa, Andrew R. Schottky, of Merced, and Marshall Nuckolls, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J.

This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate the will of William Lances, deceased. The order was made following a contest of the will, before a jury. After the presentation of all of the evidence, the court directed the jury to answer special interrogatories favorably to the proponent of the will and dismissed the contest.

William Lances was an unmarried, illiterate, but rather shrewd American Indian, and at the time of his death on April 1, 1930, was of the age of about 50 years. He had no children and lived on real property owned by him in Mariposa county westerly from the entrance to Yosemite valley. A portion of his land was leased to the Associated Oil Company under a twenty-year contract at an annual rental of $1,000. He left an estate consisting of land, a few hundred dollars in cash, and other personal property, all of which is said to be of the value of approximately $25,000. After his death, the respondent, Abner B. Baker, filed for probate a will purporting to be the will of the decedent, and in which Baker was named the sole beneficiary, and executor without bond. John Brown, claiming to be the uncle of the decedent, filed a contest of and objections to Baker's petition for the probate of the will on the grounds that the will was not executed in the manner and form required by law and that the execution of said will was the result of undue influence on the part of the proponent Baker. The question involved on the appeal is as to the correctness of the action of the trial court in so directing the jury.

[1] In determining whether, in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by the contestant is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury, the same rules apply as in civil cases. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252; Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 155 P. 631.

[2, 3] It has become the established law of this state that the power of the court to direct a verdict is absolutely the same as the power of the court to grant a nonsuit. A nonsuit or a directed verdict may be granted "only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given." Newson v. Hawley, 205 Cal. 188, 270 P. 364; Perera v. Panama-Pacific Int. Exp. Co., 179 Cal. 63, 175 P. 454; Estate of Sharon, 179 Cal. 447, 177 P. 283; Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 175, 214 P. 496; 24 Cal. Jur. pp. 912–918.

Unless it can be said as a matter of law that, when so considered, no other reasonable conclusion is legally deducible from the evidence, and that any other holding would be so lacking in evidentiary support that a reviewing court would be impelled to reverse it upon appeal, or the trial court to set it aside as a matter of law, the trial court is not justified in taking the case from the jury. Umsted v. Scofield Eng. Const. Co., 203 Cal. 224, 228, 263 P. 799. A motion for a directed verdict "is in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, and is governed by practically the same rules, and concedes as true the evidence on behalf of the adverse party, with all fair and reasonable inferences to be deduced therefrom. * * * Even though a court might be justified in granting a new trial, it would not be justified in directing a verdict on the same evidence. * * * The power of a court in passing upon such motions is strictly limited. It has no power to weigh the evidence, but is bound to view it in the most favorable light in support of the verdict. The right of a court to direct a verdict is the same as the right of a court to grant a nonsuit. This can be done only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving plaintiffs' evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, including every legitimate inference which may be drawn therefrom, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such verdict was given. * * * If, in the opinion of the court, the evidence is unreliable, it is its duty to grant a new trial, and it may grant such a trial even where there is substantial evidence to sustain the verdict, if it believes that the evidence preponderates against the verdict." Hunt v. United Bank & Trust Company of California, 210 Cal. 108, 291 P. 184, 188. In other words, the function of the trial court on a motion for a directed verdict is analogous to and practically the same as that of a reviewing court in determining, on appeal, whether there is evidence in the record of sufficient substance to support a verdict. Although the trial court may weigh the evidence and judge of the credibility of the witnesses on a motion for a new trial, it may not do so on a motion for a directed verdict.

Considering the evidence in the light of the rules of law to be applied, the record discloses the following facts in support of the contestant's cause: The proponent, Abner B. Baker, is an attorney at law, but during all of the times involved in this controversy was not engaged in active practice. He has at all times, however, maintained his status as a member of the State Bar on the inactive list. He and the decedent owned and occupied neighboring properties and had been on friendly terms for some twenty years. The decedent was accustomed to consult with the proponent on business and legal matters from time to time. The proponent neither charged nor received from the decedent any attorney fees for legal advice, but the decedent assisted the proponent in performing work about the latter's place at various times and at "hog killing" time. A few days prior to December 19, 1929, the date on which the purported will was executed, the proponent had occasion to go from his home to San Francisco to purchase and take delivery of an automobile. He requested the decedent to convey him in the decedent's car to Oakland for that purpose. This was done, and on the journey together from Mariposa county to Oakland the two talked about the execution of a will by the decedent in which the proponent was to be the sole beneficiary, and it was agreed at the decedent's request that the will should be prepared by the proponent and that it should be signed by the decedent upon their return to their homes. The decedent returned in his own car some time in advance of the proponent, who arrived at his home about noon on December 19, 1929. After his noonday meal, the proponent obtained a pen, ink, and paper, and, in the absence of the decedent, and in his own handwriting, indited the will in question on a table in his own home. At about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day the decedent appeared at the proponent's home, and in the presence of the two subscribing witnesses signed the document which was complete in form and which named the proponent as sole beneficiary thereunder and as executor without bond. The subscribing witnesses signed as such in the presence of the decedent and in the presence of each other in all respects as required by law.

The foregoing evidence was uncontradicted. Under this state of the evidence there was no basis for the claim, alleged in the document of contest, that the will was not executed in the manner and form prescribed by law. But we are of the opinion that the showing thus made was sufficient as against a motion for a nonsuit with reference to the other ground of contest. It was therefore also sufficient as against the motion for a directed verdict.

We are satisfied that, at the time the decedent consulted with and requested the proponent to prepare the will and thereafter at the time of the execution of the will under the proponent's direction, a confidential relation existed between the two men. There can be no question but that at those times the decedent reposed special confidence in the proponent as one learned in the law. In the preparation and in directing the execution of the will the proponent displayed expert knowledge in the undertaking. In performing it, the proponent, as an attorney at law, assumed a duty to the decedent which he was bound to discharge in good conscience and to the best of his ability whatever might be the terms of the will. In that behalf he was not a scrivener, as he contends, merely writing out the document at the dictation of the decedent. It was not essential, we think, that the proponent should have received a cash or other specific consideration for his service in that respect in order to charge him with the relationship of trust and confidence in the transaction. He assumed the position and must be deemed bound by it.

There is next brought home to the proponent an uncontradicted showing that he unduly profited by the terms of the will. He was to receive the whole of the estate, representing a very substantial amount and to the prejudice of the heirs of the decedent. In this respect the case is distinguishable from Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57, and Estate of Shay, 196 Cal. 355, 237 P. 1079, where it was held that under the wills there in question it could not be said that the beneficiaries named in the wills would unduly profit thereunder.

[4] In addition to the foregoing there was in the present case active participation on the part of the proponent in the execution of the will. He drew the will, prepared it in his own handwriting, and presented it to the decedent and the subscribing witnesses for execution. It has been said that the drawing of the will by a beneficiary thereunder who was at the time the attorney for the testator, coupled with the latter's age, suffering, and disease, raised the implication or presumption that the will was procured by the undue influence of the attorney. Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 508, 82 P. 57. Here we have no sufficient showing that the decedent was mentally weak or incapable of performing the testamentary act, but we have the active participation on the part of the beneficiary in the execution of the will. Where one who unduly profits by a will sustains a confidential relationship to the testator and actively participates in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is upon him to show that the will was not induced by his undue influence. Estate of Shay, 196 Cal. 355, 363, 237 P. 1079; Estate of Gallo, 61 Cal. App. 163, 214 P. 496. This is but another way of saying that upon the concurrence of the elements just mentioned, a presumption of undue influence has arisen which must be overcome by the proponent. Whether it was overcome was a question, in the first instance, for the jury to determine.

[5, 6] The proponent was called as a witness by the contestant under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure. When so called, the contestant was entitled to rely on his evidence which was favorable to the contestant's claim and was not bound by any adverse testimony which the witness might give. Smellie v. Southern Pacific Company, 212 Cal. 540, 299 P. 529. The proponent testified that several months before the will was signed the decedent expressed a desire to leave all of his property to the proponent's minor daughter, and that he (the proponent) told the decedent "to forget it." He further testified that a day or so before the will was signed the decedent told him that he desired to leave all of his property to him; that after the will was signed and duly witnessed it was handed to the decedent with the suggestion by the proponent that he place the document in the hands of another lawyer for safe-keeping; that upon the death of the decedent the proponent visited the dwelling house of the decedent and found the will in a suitcase in one of the rooms. The proponent's counsel stresses this evidence as showing that the decedent had the will in his possession for many months after it was signed, and invokes the language used in Estate of Morey, 147 Cal. 495, 82 P. 57, to the effect that, if any undue influence was exercised by the proponent in the execution of the will, the decedent had it within his power during the intervening period to destroy the same. But the contestant was not bound by this adverse testimony. The credibility of the proponent was so impeached by witnesses for the contestant in rebuttal as to justify the jury in disregarding his testimony. The evidence on this vital point was such that it became a question of fact for the jury to determine whether the proponent was telling the truth. The testimony of the subscribing witnesses as to the circumstances occurring at the time the decedent signed the will and they subscribed as witnesses thereto was undoubtedly entitled to credit. One of them, an old acquaintance of both the proponent and the decedent, testified that in the morning of December 19, 1929, the decedent told him he was having Mr. Baker prepare some papers for him and he wanted the witness to look them over, tell him if they were all right, sign as a witness, and be at the proponent's home at about 2 o'clock in the afternoon; that at the appointed time the witnesses appeared as suggested; that the proponent then read over the will to the decedent, after which the decedent said that it was all right, "that is the way I want it"; that, when the will was signed, the decedent was of sound and disposing mind; and that there was nothing in his appearance that was unusual or out of the ordinary. The other subscribing witness testified to the same effect. This testimony apparently had great weight with the trial court, but, as above indicated, the contestant was not bound by it, and it could not be considered as determinative by the trial court in the face of substantial evidence in favor of the contestant's case. Under these circumstances we conclude that the issue of undue influence was one for the determination of the jury.

The order is reversed.

JOHNSTON v. COURTIAL et al.

S. F. 14365.

Supreme Court of California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

As Modified Oct. 21, 1932.

1. Evidence ⇐419(9).

Extrinsic evidence respecting first year's rental on oil lease, differing from consideration mentioned in written lease, held admissible, since true consideration may be shown by extrinsic evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and § 1962, subd. 2).

2. Appeal and error ⇐1047(2).

That no ruling was made on appellant's objection to evidence and motion to strike held not to require reversal, where evidence was admissible and considered by court.

Inadvertent failure of court to make a ruling on admissibility of such evidence did not require reversal, since, if court had ruled at time, or later, on objection and motion, its rulings could properly have been only one way; that is, in favor of appellant's adversary.

3. Mines and minerals ⇐78(7).

Evidence supported finding that drilling for oil on leased premises was not commenced within specified time, nor rental paid; hence lease was forfeited.

4. Quieting title ⇐44(4).

In quiet title action, plaintiff's title, acquired by distribution decree in decedent's estate and admitted in answer, held sufficiently established.

Appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action to quiet title.

On the 23d of September, 1929, the plaintiff was the owner of 2,743 acres of land in Alameda county. On that day, as lessor, she executed a lease of the premises to the defendant Alexis W. Courtial, and Walter S. Kingsbury as lessees. The lease recites "that the lessor, for and in consideration of ten dollars to her in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, leases to the lessees" the land which is particularly described, and further provides in respects pertinent to this controversy that "this lease is for a period of one year from the date hereof and no longer unless the further conditions as to extensions of time by additional rental payments have been complied with by said lessees, or the drilling for oil has been commenced and continued within the first one year period in good faith, and all other conditions and covenants of this lease are fully complied with by said lessees, and said lease shall be on the following terms and conditions * * * (3) the lessees agree to start the drilling of a well for oil upon the premises herein leased within one (1) year from the date of this agreement, and to faithfully continue the work of drilling said well, after commencing the same, with due diligence. * * * If said lessees have not complied with paragraph three (3) within the first year of this lease, viz.: if said lessees have not commenced the drilling of a well for oil upon the premises herein leased within one (1) year from the date of this agreement, and shall not have continued the work of drilling said well after commencing the same, with due diligence * * * then * * * said lessees may extend the period of commencing the first well for an additional period of four (4) years by paying to the lessor, in advance, upon the fifteenth day of September, 1930, and upon the fifteenth day of September of each year thereafter until said four (4) years shall have elapsed, a rental of $2743 per annum, which shall be rental paid in advance for each year of said four (4) year period, which said rental shall cease when drilling operations are commenced in good faith and continued with due diligence in good faith as provided in paragraph three (3) * * * (20) Any breach of any of the terms or conditions of said lease by the lessees or their assigns before discovery of oil upon said premises * * * in paying quantities * * * or if the said lessees or their assigns shall fail to pay the rent of $2743 per annum as herein provided when due, shall absolutely, without notice, terminate, annul, set aside and forfeit this lease, and said lessees or their assigns shall have no further right or interest of any kind whatsoever in and to said premises, and all of said premises shall immediately, without notice, revert to said lessor, and all interest of said lessees or their assigns shall be forfeited, annulled and said lessees hereby absolutely agree without any qualification to said forfeiture and waive all notice in event of any breach or failure to pay rent as aforesaid."

Under date of October 17, 1929, Courtial and Kingsbury, the lessees, assigned said lease to George H. Shank, George K. Kolls, and John W. Luter. On January 31, 1930, Shank, Kolls, and Luter assigned said lease to the Alameda Petroleum Company, a corporation whose articles of incorporation were filed in this state by Courtial, Shank, and W. A. Edwards, as incorporators. On May 28, 1930, Kingsbury and Shank again assigned all of their right, title, and interest in and to said lease to the defendant A. M. Gilstrap.

Concluding that neither the lessees nor their assigns had started the drilling of a well for oil upon the premises prior to September 29, 1930, and that the rental of $2,743, due on September 15, 1930, had not been paid, the plaintiff commenced this action on October 27, 1930, to quiet her title as against the recorded lease and the assignments thereof. The defendants named were Alexis W. Courtial, A. M. Gilstrap, Alameda Petroleum Company, a corporation, and numerous fictitious defendants. Courtial and the corporation defendant defaulted. Gilstrap answered, admitting his alleged claim of interest in said lease, affirmatively alleging an interest therein by the assignment to him from Kingsbury on May 28, 1930, and alleging full performance by him of the terms of the lease. The action was dismissed as to the fictitious defendants.

The court found that the drilling for oil on said premises had not been commenced within the specified time and that the rental required in order to extend the lease beyond September 15, 1930, had not been paid. Judgment was entered accordingly. Gilstrap alone appealed, and he will be referred to as the defendant.

[1-3] It appears without contradiction in the evidence that the defendant Courtial was the one who negotiated with the plaintiff for the execution of said lease; that the plaintiff at all times prior to the execution of the lease demanded a rental of $1 per acre per annum until oil in paying quantities was discovered; that the negotiations for the lease were concluded on or about July 30, 1929, on which day Courtial paid to the plaintiff the sum of $1,000 as a deposit on a lease to be prepared by William H. Donahue, one of the plaintiff's attorneys; that thereafter and on or before the execution of the lease the plaintiff was paid the further sum of $1,743. The plaintiff introduced evidence which, if admissible and properly in the record, established beyond dispute that the $10 recited in the lease as having been paid upon the execution of the lease on account of the first year's rental, was not paid in that specific amount; that the first year's rental was at the rate of $1 per acre and the whole of the sum of $2,743 was paid to the plaintiff on or before the execution of the lease as and for the rental for the one year ending September 23, 1930. The defendant objected to this evidence on the ground that it tended to vary the terms of the written contract which recited the sum of $10 as the consideration for the first year's rental, relying upon section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure and authorities to the same effect, viz. that, when the terms of a contract are reduced to writing, it is to be considered as containing all of the terms of the agreement, except in the cases excluded by the section itself, none of which is here present. The plaintiff relies on subdivision 2 of section 1962 of the same Code as supplying a further exception to the general rule urged by the defendant, viz. that the truth of the recital in a written instrument of the consideration thereof is not conclusive, but that the true consideration may be shown by extrinsic evidence. The position of the plaintiff in this respect is well supported, both by the Code section and by the authorities. Royer v. Kelley, 174 Cal. 70, 161 P. 1148; 6 Cal. Jur. p. 197 et seq., and cases therein cited. The plaintiff's evidence as to the true consideration for the first year's rental was therefore admissible, and is properly in the record. It must be held that the rental required on September 15, 1930, was not, under the evidence, paid within time or at all, and the failure of those interested in the lease to comply with its terms in this respect terminated their rights thereunder unless it should be said that the further finding of the court that the lessees, their successors and assigns, did not "commence the drilling of a well for oil upon the premises" within one year from the date of the lease is without evidentiary support. The evidence on this point was from several sources. The plaintiff testified that she inspected the premises on September 30, 1930. She saw a boy on the place and no one else and nothing on the property indicating any activity under the lease except some old lumber in disorder and some tools on the ground. Her brother, Luke B. Carr, also inspected the premises in October, and all he saw was some old twisted iron, old lumber, some wooden wheels, and a little tank. By the testimony of other witnesses, including the defendant himself, it is conclusively established that no drilling for oil was commenced prior to September 23, 1930, nor in fact prior to the trial. We conclude that the finding was amply supported by the evidence.

During the course of the trial the plaintiff contended that the defendant obtained nothing by the assignment to him from Kingsbury and Shank on May 28, 1930. There is much force in the contention. Kingsbury had assigned to Shank, Kolls, and Luter on October 17, 1929. These three had joined in the assignment to the Alameda Petroleum Company on January 31, 1930. These assignments, if valid, vested in the corporation the title to the lease, and Kingsbury and Shank had nothing to assign in the following month of May. The assignment to the corporation has not, we think, been successfully impeached, but we need not base an affirmance on that ground, for the reason that the findings and judgment are otherwise supported.

[4] It is further insisted by the defendant that in this class of actions the plaintiff must prevail, if at all, on the strength of her own title and not on the weakness of the defendant's title, and that in this case she failed to establish title in herself. It sufficiently appears that the plaintiff acquired her interest in said real property by decree of distribution in the matter of the estate of George Johnston, deceased. Furthermore, the plaintiff's title, alleged in the complaint, is admitted in the defendant's answer.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ACHAL.

Cr. 1199.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 6, 1932.

1. Criminal law ⇐865(1).

Instruction in murder prosecution, where jury convicted of manslaughter, urging jury to reach decision and to avoid new trial, held not to have forced compromise verdict.

Such instruction was to effect that jurors could have evidence re-read, and though they had been deliberating for some time, it was extremely important to both the people and the defendant that the trouble and expense and delay of a new trial be avoided if it could be done fairly under the evidence, with justice to both sides.

2. Homicide ⇐189.

Where, in murder prosecution, enmity between decedent and defendant claiming homicide was in self-defense, was shown, defendant's testimony showing reason for enmity held properly rejected as immaterial.

Facts disclosed that decedent and defendant were both members of the Hindu race, that defendant testified he had refused to assist decedent, alleged to be a spy, in securing the deportation of a third Hindu, and instead threatened to expose such matters to a Hindu religious organization; that such threat caused decedent's attempted attack; and that the excluded testimony went to show the purpose of the Hindu organization and the scope of its activities.

3. Homicide ⇐339.

Striking out testimony in murder prosecution showing decedent's occupation was that of blackmailer and stool pigeon held not prejudicial.

4. Witnesses ⇐372(2).

Refusing cross-examination of state's witness, in murder prosecution, regarding whether named individual told witness how to testify, held not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

S. Achal, also known as Bhagat Singh, was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Ray Manwell and W. P. Rich, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Presiding Justice PRESTON delivered the opinion of the court.

Defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and upon a trial, following his plea of not guilty, a jury returned a verdict finding the said defendant guilty of the crime of manslaughter. A motion for a new trial was denied and judgment rendered directing the imprisonment of the defendant for the term provided by law. Defendant appeals from the said judgment and from the order denying a new trial.

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

We find it unnecessary to detail the facts of the admitted homicide, though in discussing the grounds urged on the appeal, such features of the case as will serve to throw light upon the arguments made will be detailed.

The points urged for a reversal total four in number.

[1] First, appellant contends that the trial judge forced a compromise verdict by an instruction given the jury. The case had been given to the jury at about 10 o'clock in the morning, and about 9 o'clock p. m. of the same day the jury requested the reading of certain testimony. After this testimony was read the jury again retired, and about 9:30 a. m. of the next day the jury again returned into court and reported little likelihood of an agreement. At this time the court below gave the instruction or suggestion complained of. The trial judge said: "There has been an agreement reached by juries after having been out a longer period than you have been out. The facts of the case are all before you. It has been quite a protracted trial, and the essential features of it have been covered by many different witnesses. The evidence is here available for you if you desire to hear any of it re-read, and it appears to me you ought to be able to reach an agreement on due consideration. There is no desire on the part of the court to punish the jury nor influence you in any way in any prolonged session. It is extremely important that the case be determined. You haven't been out twenty-four hours yet, and this is a murder case, the highest type of case known to the law. It is both important to The People and the defendant that the trouble and expense and delay of a new trial be avoided, if it can be done fairly under the evidence, with justice to both sides." It is the concluding portion to which appellant most strenuously objects.

We find no merit in the point. Appellant cites People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 77 P. 666, 669. A careful reading of the opinion in the cited case supports the record as being free from error. We might quote, however, the words of Judge McFarland in affirming the judgment, as follows: "I desire to say further that while upon the record in this case it appears that appellants were not prejudiced by the guarded expressions of the court to the jury on the subject of their efforts to agree, still such expressions are hazardous, and it would be better for the court to say nothing on that subject. There might be cases where such remarks would be construed by the jury as urging an agreement to convict." As said in Frandsen v. C., R. I. Co., 36 Iowa, 372, what the court said was abundantly true and practical, and ought to have occurred to the jury without the necessity of having it said to them by the court. Quoting further from People v. Miles, supra: "The point is that it was proper for the court to urge the importance of reaching a verdict, and, as it intimated no opinion of its own or suggested how the verdict should go, the defendants were not prejudiced."

[2] The second contention is as follows: The court erred in restricting a witness, M. S. Sigera, from testifying to very material and explanatory matters in behalf of the defendant. The parties to the fatal affray, defendant and decedent, were of the Hindu race. The defense was that of self-defense, based on the claim that decedent was the aggressor, and that defendant himself, without fault, was compelled, in the necessary defense of his person, to slay his assailant. It developed that there exists several factions among the Hindus, and that there are amongst them certain individuals marked as spies for the British government, whose alleged sphere is to check up the propaganda circulated throughout this country in aid of interests or organizations opposed to the British rule in India. It seems that the decedent was accused of being one of these agents or spies, and had attempted to induce the defendant to aid him in some way in turning in or securing the deportation of a third Hindu. The defendant, refusing to become a party to the affair, alleged that he was threatened with bodily harm by the decedent, and that he (defendant) had told decedent that the matter would be brought to the attention of the central Hindu organization in Stockton, which organization was known as and called the "Sikh Temple." It was in the record that this organization was a religious and social organization. The defendant's testimony was to the effect that decedent was extremely fearful lest the whole affair be "aired out" before the organization, and that defendant's threat to do so was the cause or motive of decedent's attack. Defendant sought to show, by the witness referred to, the purpose of the organization of the "Sikh Temple," and the scope of its activities. The trial court sustained objections to this line of testimony. The reasons assigned by the trial court were as follows: "We can't go into the details of the quarrel or disagreement between defendant and the deceased. The material fact is that they did have some quarrel. We have the defendant's account of what the decedent said to him and the matters that led up to the final quarrels or culmination of the dispute." And in the same discussion the learned trial judge very aptly pointed out that if two men disagreed about the policies of the dominant political parties, it would be hardly material to try out the merits of the platform of the respective parties. We agree with the conclusions of the trial judge. The material fact of enmity or ill will being shown, the reason for that feeling was immaterial, particularly in so far as it might affect the motives of the decedent.

If decedent was the aggressor, and had unlawfully attacked defendant, the latter's right of self-defense was in no wise strengthened by the fact that decedent's malice was ill founded; and surely the right of self-defense would or could not have been abridged through the fact of decedent's ill will having been well earned by defendant.

[3] The third ground of appeal is as follows: "The court erred in striking out certain testimony of one Hindu Singh, in reference to the occupation of the deceased among his countrymen prior to the date of the homicide." The testimony stricken out may be detailed. The witness had stated that he knew decedent for four or five years, and was then asked if he knew his occupation, to which latter question the witness answered in the affirmative. Then being asked the occupation of decedent, the witness replied: "Blackmail and stool pigeon." This is the evidence that was stricken. We deem it useless to argue this out with appellant. Little or no authority is cited. It may suffice to say that there is no open season on blackmailers or stool pigeons, and the terms are too general to mark traits of character, particularly those traits that are involved in a proceeding as the one before us. If the decedent had pursued his alleged occupation along lines contacting directly with defendant, there probably would have been no exclusion of evidence disclosing the specific acts complained of. Without further discussion, we can find no prejudicial error in the ruling.

[4] The last ground urged is stated as follows: "The court erred in depriving counsel for defendant, in cross-examining one Kishan Singh, a witness for The People, the right to determine the character of his testimony as hearsay, and as an interested witness." The witness was asked if he was a good friend of one Sur Singh, to which he replied that he was. He was then asked if Sur Singh told him what to say. To this latter question The People interposed an objection which was sustained. The point merits little discussion. Nothing is before us to show what interest, if any, Sur Singh might have in the case, and we are not even informed if such a person as Sur Singh has any real existence. No evidence was offered to show Sur Singh's connection with the witness. It would have done no harm to allow the question, merely as a preliminary question, but if the facts as testified by the witness were true, it would make little difference who, if anyone, told him to so testify. The harm in approaching or coaching a witness lies in the intent to put forth false testimony. If the witness had approached one of his countrymen and detailed his observations, there would be no wrong in the latter advising the witness to go into court and testify.

In conclusion we may adapt the old saying that "faint praise but damns" to fit the instant case, with the change that "faint criticism but commends."

After a long, hard-fought trial, wherein defendant had the aid of two very able and experienced counsel, it surely reflects upon the fairness of the proceeding when the said counsel can find nothing prejudicial to the rights of their client other than the claims urged. The trial judge, upon the return of the verdict, expressed a mild surprise that the verdict did not carry the extreme penalty, and the record is convincing to the end that this surprise was not entirely feigned.

The order denying defendant a new trial is affirmed. The judgment is affirmed.

Hugh Martin Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Roy B. Maxey, of Modesto, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

On the 10th day of August, 1929, the defendant insurance association issued its policy of life insurance in the sum of $1,500 to Annie Perkins, in which policy the plaintiff was named as beneficiary to the amount of $750. Annie Perkins died on June 6, 1930, and thereupon the said association refusing to pay to plaintiff the amount specified in said policy, to wit, the said sum of $750, this action was commenced.

The action was dismissed as to all of the defendants except the said association and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff and against it, and from this judgment the association has appealed.

Appellant argues as a ground for reversal that the said Annie Perkins in her application for membership in said association made certain false statements regarding her health and physical condition and that these statements were warranties and, being untrue, they rendered the policy void; the said alleged false statements being as follows:

"Q. Have you knowledge that any physical or mental disease exists in your system? A. No.

"Q. Are you now in good health? A. Yes."

She further stated in said application as follows: "I am in good health and so far as I know have no disease or other condition which would prevent me from obtaining life insurance. I agree to the terms, conditions and provisions of the certificate of membership that this application become a part of such certificate and that any false statement, misrepresentation or concealment of any material fact shall make void my membership."

The policy also provides that it shall be void if the insured has made any false statement, misrepresentation, or concealment of any material fact in her application.

Dr. J. K. Ransom, a physician and surgeon, who had practiced as such for many years, and who represented the association in the medical examination of applicants for membership, testified that he examined the said Annie Perkins for admission as a member of the association and found nothing wrong with her physical condition and passed her as a first-class subject for membership; that there were no indications from the examination he made that she had myocarditis nor any symptoms of that disease.

Three witnesses testified that they were intimate acquaintances and neighbors of Annie Perkins; that she was a dressmaker by occupation; that they had known her for from seven to ten years prior to her death and that during all of that time her health was good; that she had never complained of any illness prior to March, 1930.

Respondent testified that he had boarded at her home from 1923 until March, 1930; that during all of that time her health was good; that she never had any illness nor occasion to call in a physician.

Dr. Fred R. De Lappe, a witness for appellant, testified that he first met Annie Perkins in April, 1930. She was, at that time, a patient in the county hospital; that an examination of said patient disclosed that she was suffering from chronic myocarditis and marked oedema of the legs and thighs; that from said examination he formed the opinion that the said patient had been ill from myocarditis for over a year, and he was also of the opinion that the said patient knew that she was suffering from this trouble during the year prior to his said examination. He further stated that this disease is apparent, that it generally follows some other type of infection, and the patient usually knows when it begins.

[1-3] If we assume that the representation of the assured in her application for membership that to her knowledge she had no disease at the date of said application was a warranty, then before we can determine that the policy is void for that reason it must appear that she knew that she was suffering from disease. Where an applicant makes a positive statement as to a material matter, it is immaterial whether the misrepresentation was intentional or accidental, or honestly made. O'Connor v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 146 Cal. 484, 489, 80 P. 688; Bacon on Benefit Societies, § 210. But where the answers of the applicant to the questions in the application are limited or qualified, by any particular or general expression, clearly showing an intention to so limit or qualify his statements, effect will be given to such extent. Bacon on Benefit Societies, § 205a; Northwestern Mutual L. Insurance Co. v. Gridley, 100 U. S. 614, 25 L. Ed. 746.

It was held in this last-named case that where the question was whether certain relatives of the applicant had been afflicted with any hereditary disease and he replied, "Not to my knowledge," that the affirmation was narrowed down to what the applicant personally knew touching the subject.

In the instant case the answer to the question, "Have you knowledge that any physical or mental disease exists in your system?" was, "No," and she further qualified this statement by stating in her application that she was in good health as far as she knew.

Is it a reasonable supposition that where Dr. Ransom, a physician and surgeon of wide experience, in making the examination of Annie Perkins for the said membership, and whose duty it was to ascertain whether or not she was suffering from any disease, could find even no suspicion of anything of the kind, that under these circumstances the said Annie Perkins would have knowledge of the existence of disease?

If myocarditis was so apparent in the system of Annie Perkins at the date of said examination, as testified by Dr. De Lappe, that she must have been aware of it, then in that event it would seem that Dr. Ransom would not have failed to discover it at the time he made his examination of her.

[4] We are also of the opinion that there being a conflict in the evidence as to whether or not Annie Perkins was in good health and free from disease at the time she made her said application for membership, and there being substantial evidence to support the finding of the trial court that she was in good health and free from disease at that date, the judgment must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Action by H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, copartners doing business under the name and style of the Ginsberg Tile Company, against Salvatore Faraone and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Anthony S. Devoto, of San Francisco, for appellants.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANDIS, Justice pro tem.

The action as originally commenced on May 25, 1926, was entitled "Ginsberg Tile Company, a copartnership, against Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife," alleging that certain work had been done by the plaintiff upon the improved property of the defendants under an agreement between them whereby plaintiff was to be paid $593.75 for its work, which amount was unpaid, and that a claim of lien had been filed for record on February 24, 1926, with a prayer for judgment for said sum of $593.75, and for a foreclosure of the lien. There was no allegation in the complaint respecting the copartnership named in the caption, or showing who were its constituent members.

Defendants demurred upon the sole ground that plaintiff had no legal capacity to sue, and moved to dismiss upon the same ground. On July 17, 1926, and before the demurrer and motion were heard, an amended complaint was filed in the name of the same plaintiff and with two personal defendants, G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich, and four fictitious defendants added, and containing an allegation that plaintiff Ginsberg Tile Company was at all times mentioned a copartnership composed of H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, and that they had complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, and other allegations not found in the original complaint. Defendants promptly demurred to the amended complaint again upon the ground that plaintiff lacked the capacity to sue, and again moved to dismiss upon the same ground, and moved to strike the amended complaint from the files upon the ground that it changed the cause of action originally set forth. The trial court granted the motion to dismiss, but took no action upon the demurrer or motion to strike.

An appeal was taken from the order of the trial court granting the motion to dismiss. The appellate court reversed the order of the trial court granting the motion to dismiss with directions to the trial court to allow the complaint to be again amended. Ginsberg Tile Co. v. Faraone, 99 Cal. App. 381, 278 P. 866, 869.

After the going down of the remittitur, and on August 26, 1929, a second amended complaint was filed in which the name of the plaintiff was given as "H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, copartners doing business under the name and style of Ginsberg Tile Company" against Salvatore Faraone, Jennie Faraone, his wife, G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich. Defendants Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife, demurred to the second amended complaint again upon the ground of plaintiff's lack of capacity to sue, and upon the ground that plaintiff's alleged cause of action was barred by section 1190 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and again moved to dismiss upon the same ground, and upon the additional ground that the second amended complaint changed the cause of action originally set forth, not only as to parties, but also as to subject-matter, and moved to strike the second amended complaint from the files upon the same ground. The trial court overruled defendants' demurrer and denied defendants' motion to dismiss and strike.

Appellants contend that their demurrer to the second amended complaint should have been sustained without leave to amend and that their motions to dismiss and strike should have been granted, for the following reasons: (1) A copartnership acting under a fictitious name cannot sue in that name, citing section 388, Code Civ. Proc. (2) As there was no legal entity in plaintiff, there was no foundation upon which to base an amendment. (3) Inasmuch as it does not appear by affirmative allegation in the original complaint that the plaintiff, designated as "Ginsberg Tile Company, a copartnership," was represented in the persons of H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, as the owners of the business transacted under that name, it was not within the power of the court to allow plaintiff to amend the title of his action by changing it from "Ginsberg Tile Company, a copartnership, Plaintiff, v. Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife, Defendants", to "H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, copartners doing business under the name and style of Ginsberg Tile Company, Plaintiffs." (4) The second amended complaint entirely and completely changes the cause of action originally set forth in the original complaint, both as to parties and subject-matter. The party plaintiff in the original complaint is "Ginsberg Tile Company, a copartnership," and the parties plaintiff in the second amended complaint are "H. Ginsberg and S. Ginsberg, copartners doing business under the name and style of Ginsberg Tile Company." That it is thus apparent that in the second amended complaint new plaintiffs are brought into the case. (5) The action herein is barred by section 1190 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Respondent contends that all the points urged by appellants on the present appeal were presented to and determined by the District Court of Appeal on the former appeal.

It is clear that the points numbered 1, 2, and 3 were presented to, considered, and determined on the former appeal adversely to the contention of appellants, as will be disclosed by the following excerpts from said decision: It is there held that the statute and the authorities in this state fully warrant the conclusion at which the lower court arrived, namely, that plaintiff had no legal capacity, but it must be remembered that the designation of the plaintiff, as shown in the complaint at the time the matter was so considered and determined by the District Court of Appeal was "Ginsberg Tile Company, a copartnership," and not as now appears in the amended complaint, as amended under the direction of the said District Court of Appeal. In any event, said statement was followed by the court in effect holding that by granting the motion to dismiss, the opportunity to amend was cut off and that by demurring and moving on one ground and not on the other, the defendants waived the admitted defect and irregularity; that the defect is not absolutely fatal; that, if a cause of action exists, the complaint is amendable; that the granting of the motion to dismiss was tantamount, so far as the question of the amendment is concerned, to the sustaining of a demurrer without leave to amend; that, if the amended complaint was susceptible of amendment so as to show upon its face the real parties plaintiff, and we are satisfied it was, the case would seem to be squarely within the case of Metzger v. Vestal, 76 Cal. App. 409, 418, 244 P. 942, 945, wherein this language was used: "While the demurrers were properly sustained, * * * the plaintiffs ought to be permitted to amend in order that the case may be decided upon the merits rather than upon technical rules of pleading. 'Unless it be clear to a trial court that a defective complaint cannot be amended so as to obviate the objections made thereto, a plaintiff desiring it should be allowed reasonable opportunity to so amend.' "

On the former appeal, the court further stated: "The motion to dismiss, the granting of which gave rise to this appeal, was made upon the ground that 'plaintiff' had no legal capacity to sue. The motion to strike out the amended complaint was upon the ground that it wholly changed the cause of action set forth in the original complaint. This latter point is discussed in the briefs, but it is not necessary to discuss it herein. Moreover, as stated above, it was not the ground of the motion to dismiss and no action was taken upon the motion to strike, by the lower court."

Therefore, as hereinbefore stated, the District Court of Appeal having reversed the order of the trial court and directed that the complaint be amended, it is obvious that, in so far as the points numbered, respectively 1, 2, and 3 are concerned, they were definitely decided on the former appeal. The decision thereon was afterwards reviewed by the appellate court under a petition for a rehearing, which was denied; and a petition to have the cause heard by the Supreme Court, after judgment in the District Court of Appeal, was denied by the Supreme Court.

[1] With respect to point 4, dealing with the motion to strike out the amended complaint upon the ground that it wholly changed the cause of action set forth in the original complaint, and point 5, contending that the action is barred by section 1190 of the Code of Civil Procedure, appellants contend that the first and second amended complaints involving G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich for the first time were filed beyond the time fixed by the statute for the institution of a mechanic's lien suit, and in connection therewith we may use the words of appellants, that the test is, "Does the amended complaint introduce a wholly different cause of action?" and may adopt and quote the rule found in the case of Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 P. 305, 307, cited by appellants, wherein it is said, " 'A complainant (is not) at liberty to abandon the entire case made by his bill, and make a new and different case by way of amendment,' or 'to strike out the entire substance and prayer of his bill, and insert a new cause by way of amendment.' "

[2] Whatever may have been the rights of defendants G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich need not be considered, for the reason that, after their demurrer to the second amended complaint was overruled and their motions to strike and dismiss were denied, they failed to answer, and their default was entered, and, in so far as the appellants, the defendants Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, are concerned, their rights were not affected by the joinder of the defendants G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich, and they cannot now be heard to object to the joinder. Gardner v. Samuels, 116 Cal. 84, 47 P. 935, 58 Am. St. Rep. 135; Madary v. City of Fresno, 20 Cal. App. 91, 128 P. 340; Holmes v. Anderson, 90 Cal. App. 276, 265 P. 1010; Blodgett v. Trumbull, 83 Cal. App. 566, 257 P. 199; O'Connell v. Rogers, 72 Cal. App. 539, 237 P. 775; Oliver v. Staples & Pfeiffer, 67 Cal. App. 570, 227 P. 927.

In this action in the original complaint, briefly stated, plaintiff alleged that defendants Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife, were the owners of certain land; that plaintiff and defendants agreed that plaintiff would do certain tile work in a house on the property, for which defendants agreed to pay the sum of $593.75; that plaintiff performed the work according to said agreement; that no part of the sum agreed upon has been paid; that a claim of lien was filed and recorded in the office of the county recorder where the land is situate; and the usual prayer for judgment for the amount, and that same be adjudged a lien against the property, and that the property be sold, etc. Although the amended complaint amplified in many respects the rather sketchy averments of the original pleading, and added allegations not found in the original complaint, the only material change was that the contract, instead of having been made directly with the defendants Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife, was made with the defendants G. M. Sourich and T. A. Sourich, who were the real contractors for said work, and that the said Sourichs were acting for and on account and also as agents of the defendants Salvatore Faraone and Jennie Faraone, his wife.

[3] In both the original and the amended complaints, it was sought to foreclose the identical lien, for the identical work, labor, and materials, arising out of the identical transaction and covering the same property. In clarification of the rule that a wholly different cause of action cannot be substituted by amendment, in the case of Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 424, 64 P. 705, 706, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53, the following rules are promulgated: " * * * That great liberality should be used by the courts in allowing amendments (Burns v. Scooffy, 98 Cal. 276, 33 P. 86, and cases cited); and that the allowance of amendments is a matter within the discretion of the courts (Coubrough v. Adams, 70 Cal. 378, 11 P. 634; Lestrade v. Barth, 17 Cal. 288). And in practice the courts have been extremely liberal,—as, e. g., in Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 376, 14 P. 24, where the complaint was amended so as to describe a different tract of land from that described in the original complaint; or in Walsh v. McKeen, 75 Cal. 519, 17 P. 673, where the case was changed from an action at law to a case in equity; or in Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 P. 100 [9 Am. St. Rep. 164], where the change allowed was from an action on a special contract to an action on a quantum meruit; or as in Castagnino v. Balletta, 82 Cal. 256, 23 P. 127, where the change was from an action on a mechanic's lien to an action on the special contract, or in assumpsit; or in Bogart v. Crosby, 80 Cal. 195, 22 P. 84, where the principal debtors, who had been omitted from the original complaint, were brought in by amendment." See, also, Gambling v. Haight, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 152, affirmed 58 N. Y. 623; Becker v. Kenney, 15 Ga. App. 239, 82 S. E. 936; Sullivan Construction Co. v. Twin Falls A. Co., 44 Idaho, 520, 258 P. 529.

[4, 5] Applying these rules to the case at bar, it is clear that the cause of action set up in the original and that set up in the amended complaint was the same obligation sought to be enforced; that is to say, the obligation to pay the money agreed to be paid. Therefore it cannot be said that the cause of action was wholly changed. Where the cause of action is not changed, the time to which the statute of limitations runs is the filing of the original complaint. Frost v. Witter, supra, and cases therein cited.

It follows that there was no error in overruling the demurrer and denying the motion to strike and dismiss. No other points were urged for a reversal.

Judgment appealed from is affirmed.

DEYOE v. DEYOE.

Civ. 977.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Sept. 30, 1932.

1. Divorce ⇐303(1), 309.

Court has general power to modify divorce decree as respects custody and maintenance of parties' minor child (Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139).

2. Divorce ⇐309.

Court held authorized to modify divorce decree by requiring husband to pay stated sums for minor child's support after he attained age of 14 (Civ. Code, §§ 138, 139).

The divorce decree expressly reserved jurisdiction to make further orders for minor's support, and included parties' written agreement that court might fix amount payable after child reached age of 14, in absence of agreement thereon by parties.

3. Divorce ⇐309.

Order modifying divorce decree by requiring husband to pay $50 monthly for son's support after he attained age of 14 held not abuse of discretion (Civ. Code §§ 138, 139).

There was evidence that wife owned realty worth less than $50,000, subject to $4,500 mortgage, $954.59 delinquent taxes, and $12,000 street improvement assessment, which would be partially offset by allowance of about $11,000 for property taken; that rental value thereof was $100 per month; that she earned $75 a month in small business; that husband owned home worth $6,000, land worth $2,000, and stocks and bonds worth $60,000; that his income was $4,000 a year; and that he pledged stocks and bonds to bank to secure loan of $45,000.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Ethel Wilson Deyoe against J. Wellington Deyoe. From an order modifying a divorce decree in respect to the custody and maintenance of the parties' minor child, defendant appeals.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal from an order modifying a judgment and decree in a divorce action in respect to the custody and maintenance of the minor child of the parties. An interlocutory decree of divorce was entered on April 22, 1924, in favor of the plaintiff herein, upon the ground of the desertion of the defendant. This decree adopted, and made a part thereof a property settlement agreement previously entered into between the parties. On May 9, 1925, a final decree was entered in which was included the following: "It is further ordered and decreed that wherein said interlocutory decree makes any provision for alimony or the custody and support of children, said provision be and the same is hereby made binding on the parties affected thereby the same as if herein set forth in full. * * *"

The interlocutory decree contained the following provisions:

"Whereas, by the terms of the said agreement the custody and care of said minor child is given to plaintiff until said child shall reach the age of fourteen years, whereupon the said child shall elect which of its said parents, the said plaintiff or defendant, shall thereafter have his custody and care, but with the right in the meantime to the defendant, and thereafter to such of either the defendant or plaintiff as shall thereafter not have the care and custody of said minor child, to visit it and to have the said child visit him, or her.

"It is further, adjudged and decreed that no other disposition of the property of said plaintiff and defendant be hereby made, nor any other provision for the support and maintenance of the said plaintiff, or of the said minor child, but the custody, care and control of said minor child be awarded to plaintiff, subject to and pursuant to the terms of said agreement, the court, however, expressly reserving and retaining jurisdiction to make such further proper order as to it may be made to appear best for the support and maintenance, or for the custody, care and control of the said minor child."

The property settlement agreement, which is attached to the interlocutory decree, in addition to providing that certain property should be turned over to the plaintiff, provided as follows:

"And the First Party doth hereby agree with the Second Party that so long as said boy, J. Wellington Deyoe, Jr., is in the care and custody of the Second Party under and in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this agreement and until said boy has attained the age of 14 years he will pay to the Second Party for the care and maintenance of said boy the sum of $40.00 per month, said payment to be made on or before the 1st day of each calendar month, the first of said payments to be made January 1, 1923.

"And the First Party doth further agree that upon said boy attaining the age of 14 years and continuing in the care and custody of the Second Party he will pay monthly for the care and maintenance of said J. Wellington, Jr., and so long as said boy shall remain in said care and custody and require an allowance for his care and maintenance (said allowance to terminate in any case upon the death of the First Party or upon said boy attaining the age of twenty-one years, whichever event shall first happen), such monthly amount as the First Party shall decide upon. If the amount so decided upon is not satisfactory to the Second Party the amount shall be determined by the Superior Court of the proper county in a proceeding brought for that purpose and shall be determined by a consideration of the needs of the minor and the financial resources of both parents."

The defendant complied with the property settlement agreement by turning over to the plaintiff certain property, as therein agreed, and paid the agreed amount of $40 per month for the support of the minor until January 29, 1929, when, the minor having attained the age of 14 years, such monthly payments were discontinued. On March 7, 1930, an order was issued to show cause why the decree should not be modified in respect to the custody and maintenance of the minor child. After a hearing, an order was made on March 26, 1930, giving the care and custody of the minor to the plaintiff herein and requiring the defendant to pay to the plaintiff for the support and maintenance of said minor, the sum of $50 per month beginning April 1, 1930, and continuing until the further order of the court. From this order the defendant has appealed.

It is conceded that after reaching the age of 14 years this minor elected to remain in the custody of the respondent. The appellant contends that, since the complaint alleged that ample and sufficient provision had been made in the property settlement for the care, maintenance, and support of the minor child, since it was adjudged in the decree that sufficient and ample provision for such support and maintenance had been made in the property settlement agreement, and since this decree has become final, the court had no power to make the order appealed from. As stated by the appellant, the only issue presented is whether the respondent is "entitled to a further continuing allowance for the support of said minor child, where it is admitted that she still has all the property settled upon her by the appellant for the express purpose of providing for herself and the care, maintenance and support of said minor child during his minority." In effect, the contention of the appellant is that the court was without authority to make this order in the absence of a showing as to the necessity for such an order, that no such necessity here appears, since the respondent still retains the property turned over to her through the property settlement agreement, and that it is the duty of the respondent to use such property for the support of the minor after he has reached the age of 14 years. While standing upon the finality of the decree, as based upon the agreement of the parties, the appellant apparently would forget and omit that part thereof which calls, in addition to any property turned over, for a continuing monthly payment for the support of the child, and which provides that the amount thereof may be settled by the court.

[1, 2] There can be no question as to the general power of a court to make such an order as the one here involved. Evans v. Evans, 154 Cal. 644, 98 P. 1044; Lewis v. Lewis, 174 Cal. 336, 163 P. 42; Civ. Code, §§ 138 and 139. In addition, not only did the decree expressly reserve and retain jurisdiction to make such further order for the support of the minor as might appear to be proper, but the written agreement of the parties, included in the decree, provided that the court might fix the amount to be paid in the absence of any agreement. It fully appears that the monthly payments were stopped by the appellant after the child reached the age of 14 and that this situation was not satisfactory to the respondent. The appellant had agreed to pay monthly thereafter for the care and maintenance of the minor, the amount only being left for later determination. It is obvious that the clause in the agreement to the effect that the appellant would pay for the care and maintenance of the minor so long as he should "require an allowance for his care and maintenance," related to the needs of the child and not to the ability of the mother to pay for such needs. It is argued that the respondent agreed to accept the provisions of the agreement for her support and for the support of the child as a full and complete provision for those purposes. While this is true, these provisions are not limited to the property turned over to her, but they include the appellant's agreement to pay $40 a month for the support of the minor until he reached the age of 14 years, and thereafter to pay a monthly sum for that purpose, which sum was to be later determined in accordance with the provisions of the agreement. The appellant recognized and lived up to that part of the agreement applying prior to the time the child arrived at the age of 14 years, and the remaining part of the contract is no less binding upon him. The order complained of only requires that he comply with the terms of his agreement, and adds nothing thereto.

[3] The contract provided that the amount to be paid by the appellant after the minor reached the age of 14 years should be determined by the superior court after a consideration of the needs of the minor and the financial resources of both parties. It fully appears that this was done, and much evidence appears in the record upon these matters. It is practically conceded in appellant's brief that the financial condition of the parties had not changed in the meantime, and the evidence indicates that this is a fact. There is evidence that the respondent owns certain real property in Los Angeles worth less than $50,000; that it is subject to a mortgage for $4,500, to delinquent taxes in the amount of $954.59, and to an assessment for a street improvement in the sum of about $12,000; that its rental value is $100 per month; and that she earns $75 a month through running a small business. It further appears that the street assessment referred to will be partially offset by an allowance of about $11,000 for property taken in connection therewith. It also appears that the appellant owns a home worth $6,000, land worth $2,000, stocks and bonds which in March, 1930, were of the value of $60,000, and that his income was then $4,000 a year. In addition, it appears that he has pledged his stocks and bonds to a bank to secure a loan of $45,000, although it does not appear what became of the proceeds of the loan. The amount allowed for the support and maintenance of the minor was only increased $10 a month, which could not be considered excessive in view of the natural increase in his requirements as he advanced in age. In view of all the facts shown, we are unable to hold that the court abused its discretion in arriving at the amount fixed in the order.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Civ. 8377.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1932. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐870(3).

Unappealed order granting change of venue could not be reviewed on appeal from final judgment.

2. Courts ⇐170.

Demurrer to complaint in action to recover less than $1,000, exclusive of interest, held not to present question of superior court's jurisdiction of subject-matter, where complaint did not disclose whether defendant resided in township having population of 30,000 or more (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 76, 112; Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928).

3. Appeal and error ⇐1040(2).

Plaintiff held not prejudiced because ruling on question of superior court's jurisdiction of subject-matter of action to recover less than $1,000, exclusive of interest, was made on demurrer instead of after answer, under circumstances (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 76, 112, 433; Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928).

Circumstances disclosed that both in trial court and in appellate court the litigation was presented, without objection, as though record showed on its face that the defendant resided in township having a population of 30,000 or more, and if the demurrer had been overruled defendant would have been entitled to plead the facts in her answer.

*For subsequent opinion see 19 P.2d 981.

4. Courts ⇐472(7).
Venue ⇐80.

Superior court of county to which venue of action to recover less than $1,000, exclusive of interest, was transferred, held without jurisdiction of subject-matter where defendant resided in township having population of 30,000 or more. (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 76, 112, 832; Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928).

Superior court was without jurisdiction of subject-matter of the action, since under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 76, 112, 832, and Const. art. 6, § 5, as amended in 1928, justices' courts have jurisdiction in judicial townships having a population of 30,000 or more in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, amounts to $1,000 or less, and therefore such law ousted the superior court of jurisdiction under the circumstances although the county from which the venue was transferred had no township containing population of 30,000 or more.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by S. M. Levee against Jessie V. Harrier, as executrix of the last will and testament of L. G. Harrier, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff presented a claim to the defendant as executrix of the estate of her deceased husband. The claim was rejected and he commenced this action to collect the amount of the claim. In his complaint he inserted two counts. In the first count he alleged his claim as an open book account for moneys loaned and he pleaded as an exhibit the claim so presented. In the second count he pleaded a cause of action as for the balance due on a mutual, open, and current account; and otherwise he inserted the same allegations. The complaint was filed in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Solano, that being the county where the proceedings in probate were pending. The defendant was served and appeared and filed a demurrer and at the same time she filed a demand that the place of trial be changed to Alameda county. Thereafter her motion for a change of venue was granted and the action was transferred for trial to the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Alameda. After the action had been transferred the defendant filed an amended demurrer in which she alleged, among other things, that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject of the action. The point was based on the fact that the claim presented to the executrix showed that the demand was for $975.91 principal and that the balance of the claim was for interest. The demurrer was sustained and the plaintiff declining to amend judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. From that judgment the plaintiff has appealed under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1-4] While minor points were made it is conceded by both sides that the real point involved in the case is whether the superior court of Alameda county has jurisdiction of the subject of the action and therefore whether the order sustaining the demurrer on the ground that it had no jurisdiction is well founded in law. Prior to the amendment to section 5 of article 6 of the state Constitution, which was adopted on November 6, 1928, the jurisdiction of the superior courts, that is, courts of record, was specifically defined by the Constitution. During the same period of time the Constitution contained words to the effect that justices of the peace should have such jurisdiction as might be conferred by the Legislature, provided that such jurisdiction did not "trench upon the jurisdiction of the civil courts of record. * * *" Section 11. However, by the amendment of 1928, a radical change was enacted. Section 5 of article 6 of the state Constitution, as amended in that year, is as follows: "The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction in all civil cases and proceedings (except as in this article otherwise provided, and except, also cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law to municipal or to justices in other inferior courts). * * *" That language is repeated in section 76 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Neither in Solano county nor in Alameda county have any inferior courts been organized excepting justices' courts. Solano county has no township containing a population of thirty thousand or more. Alameda county, however, has two such townships. Section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The justices' courts shall have jurisdiction as follows: 1. In cities * * * and judicial townships, having a population of thirty thousand or more, said courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, * * * amounts to one thousand dollars or less; * * * 2. In those having a population of less than thirty thousand, said courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest * * * amounts to three hundred dollars or less. * * *" It is clear that the superior court in and for the county of Solano had jurisdiction. When the motion to change the place of trial was made in that court and it appeared that the defendant resided in Alameda county, said court made its order transferring the action to the superior court of Alameda county. There is nothing in the record showing that there was any error in that order. Code Civ. Proc. § 398. Furthermore, whether the order was correct or incorrect, no appeal from that order was taken and said order may not be reviewed on this appeal. Starkey v. Parker, 44 Cal. App. 215, 218, 186 P. 195; 2 Cal. Jur. 823. After the order had been made and the papers had been received in Alameda county, the action was lawfully pending in the superior court of that county. It cannot be said as a matter of law that said court did not have jurisdiction of money demands in the amount of one thousand or less. The most than can be said is that it did not have jurisdiction of all such actions. It had jurisdiction of all such actions except where the action was against a defendant who resided in one of the townships having a population of thirty thousand or more. As to where the defendant resided did not appear on the face of the complaint. Therefore speaking technically, the demurrer should have been overruled, but if it had been overruled the defendant was entitled to plead the facts in her answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 433; 49 C. J. 229. Moreover, both in the trial court and in this court the litigation has been presented without objection as though the record showed on its face that the defendant resided in Oakland township. Under these circumstances we think it is clear that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the ruling made on demurrer instead of by a ruling made after answer filed. When the demurrer was presented it raised the question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter, that is, what court had the power to hear and determine the action. "The justices' courts shall have jurisdiction as follows: In * * * judicial townships, having a population of thirty thousand or more, said courts shall have original jurisdiction in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest * * * amounts to one thousand dollars or less. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 112. "Actions in justices' courts must be commenced, and, subject to the right to change the place of trial, as in this chapter provided, must be tried: * * * 9. * * * in the township or city in which the defendant resides." Code Civ. Proc. § 832. "The superior courts shall have original jurisdiction: 1. In all civil cases and proceedings except cases and proceedings in which jurisdiction is or shall be given by law * * * to justices' * * * courts. * * *" Code Civ. Proc. § 76. These provisions make it clear that the jurisdiction of the justices' courts is defined specifically and that being shown the jurisdiction of the superior court consists of other matters. In other words, the present laws oust the superior courts of jurisdiction in certain localities, one of which is Oakland township. Such a condition arose in Pennsylvania. The case of Wilson Black's Executor v. Marcus Black's Executors, 34 Pa. 354, is helpful. Samuel Black left an estate which was administered on in the orphans' court of Washington county, Pa. Later, by appropriate decrees, the legacy of Wilson Black was ascertained. The amount not having been paid, his executor commenced an action to recover it. He filed his action in the district court of Allegheny county. On motion of the defendant that court directed a nonsuit to be entered. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court. In passing on the points that court said: "It is obvious, that the District Court had jurisdiction of the action of debt, but was ousted of it by the several statutes regulating the jurisdiction of the Orphans' Court. There was no objection that this was not pleaded, and the question was discussed as if it had been—and hence there is no difficulty in this case, but a different practice would be advisable. * * * The question must, therefore, be considered as settled, that the Orphans' Court had exclusive jurisdiction, and ample power, to enforce the payment of the distributive share sued for in this case; and that the District Court were right in entering judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff. No good reason can be given why the Orphans' Court should not be held to be a court of exclusive jurisdiction in such cases. * * * It seems to me, that it was eminently proper to determine, that within its 'appointed orbit' it is a court of exclusive jurisdiction."

For the reasons above stated the judgment is affirmed.

Civ. 4776.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 28, 1932.

Dismissal and nonsuit. ⇐45.

Dismissal of action, finally set for trial over five years after oral stipulation therefor, without defendant's written consent to continuance, was mandatory (Code Civ. Proc. § 583).

Application by M. B. Crum for a writ of mandamus to the Superior Court in and for Shasta County and Walter Herzinger, Judge thereof.

Writ granted.

Jesse W. Carter, of Redding, for petitioner.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a petition for a writ of mandamus to compel the dismissal of an action under the provisions of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for failure, on the part of the plaintiff, to bring the cause to trial for more than five years after the issues are settled.

December 5, 1925, a complaint for an action in assumpsit was filed in the superior court of Shasta county. The case was entitled Wiegel v. Crum. March 12, 1926, the defendant's answer was filed. It is alleged that on November 5, 1926, by oral consent of counsel in open court, the cause was set for trial for March 28, 1927. It is conceded that no further stipulation for continuance of the cause was made. After numerous ex parte proceedings and orders made upon the court's own motion, to none of which the defendant appears to have consented, the cause was finally set for trial for October 3, 1932. On April 22, 1932, the defendant duly served and filed his motion under section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to dismiss the action. This motion was heard by the court and denied on May 20, 1932. The present petition for a writ of mandamus was then presented to this court.

Section 583, supra, provides in part: "Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff or by the court upon its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

Under the circumstances of this case, it became mandatory for the court to dismiss the action for the reason that more than five years elapsed without any written consent for a continuance on the part of the defendant before the cause was finally set for trial. 9 Cal. Jur. 543, § 30; Miller & Lux, Inc., v. Superior Court, 192 Cal. 333, 219 P. 1006. It has been held that a stipulation which will suffice to extend the statutory time for bringing the cause to trial must be reduced to writing and signed by the attorneys for the respective parties to the action. Perrin v. Miller, 35 Cal. App. 129, 169 P. 426. Since the stipulation of counsel to set the cause for trial for March 28, 1927, which was made in open court in the present case, did not purport to specifically extend the statutory five years in which the law requires a case to be brought to trial, it did not have the effect of waiving the provisions of section 583, supra. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 P. 841. Assuming, without so deciding, that the oral stipulation of counsel which was made November 5, 1926, in open court, to set the cause for trial for March 28, 1927, constituted a stipulation in writing conforming to the requirements of section 583, supra, with respect to the five-year limitation of time within which a case may be brought to trial, still, more than five years elapsed thereafter before it was finally set for trial. The oral stipulation which was made in open court extended the time for trial only to March 28, 1927. April 29, 1932, the defendant moved to dismiss the action for failure to bring it to trial within five years from the date of the filing of the answer. This was more than five years from the time when it may be said the defendant consented to a continuance of the time of trial, even though we deem that stipulation to have been made in writing, which we seriously doubt. Under a construction of the circumstances of this case most favorable to the respondent in this proceeding, it must be held that more than five years elapsed before the cause was finally set for trial, and that it was therefore mandatory for the trial court to grant the defendant's motion and dismiss the action.

Let the peremptory writ of mandamus issue requiring the respondent to dismiss the action as prayed for.

We concur: PRESTON, P. J.; PLUMMER, J.

[1] A rehearing was granted in this cause to permit further consideration of the question of whether or not this court was justified in its former conclusion that a substantial portion of the 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Compania de Inversiones de la

Baja California, S. A., a Mexican corporation (hereinafter referred to as the "Compania"), belonged to Gertrudis Marquez Barreiro as tenant in common with her former husband, was justified by the evidence before us. In determining this question we have again reviewed the printed record in this cause and the more extensive typewritten record in the appeal taken by the minors from portions of the same judgment attacked in this case (Estate of Barreiro [Cal. App.] 13 P.(2d) 1017), which we are permitted to do (Hollenbach v. Schnabel, 101 Cal. 312, 35 P. 872, 40 Am. St. Rep. 57; Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 128 P. 407; Wood v. Kennedy, 117 Cal. App. 53, 3 P.(2d) 366).

It is evident from all the records which we have, that at least up to the time of these two appeals, it was the opinion of the executor, the widow, and her counsel and others having to do with the probate proceedings, that Gertrudis Marquez Barreiro had "a vested interest," as expressed by witnesses for the executor, in a portion of the property in its possession. See Estate of Barreiro, 86 Cal. App. 764, 261 P. 509. It is evident from the written opinion of the trial judge that he also indulged in this assumption, although no findings were made upon this question. By an order not involved in this appeal he set aside the order involved in Estate of Barreiro, 86 Cal. App. 764, 261 P. 509, as beyond the jurisdiction of the probate court to make.

Our review of the records in the two appeals has led us to the conclusion that we would have to indulge in a presumption, which would be authorized by law upon the evidence before us, in order to sustain our former position. There is now pending in the superior court of San Diego county an action to determine whether or not Gertrudis Marquez Barreiro became the owner with Benigno Barreiro of a portion of their community property, if any, at the time of their final divorce in 1922, the decree of divorce not attempting to divide or dispose of their community property, if they owned any. Counsel for appellants have become exercised at the thought that what we said in our former opinion might become the law of the case and hamper the trial court in its decision of this question. The presumption which we have to invoke to sustain our former position is rebuttable and might be overcome by evidence. A decision of the question of whether or not Mrs. Barreiro is the owner of any portion of the property now possessed by the executor is not necessary on this appeal nor was it necessary in the appeal by the minors. Estate of Barreiro (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 1017. We do not desire to hamper the decision of a trial judge in another action by any unnecessary language used by us, if it could possibly be construed as establishing the law of the other case. Whatever may be said in Estate of Barreiro (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 1017, and what we may say in this opinion must not be considered or construed as holding that Gertrudis Marquez Barreiro owned, as tenant in common with her deceased husband, any portion of the capital stock of the Compania or any definite portion of the property now in the possession of the executor of his last will and testament so that such a holding may become the law of the case controlling in any proceeding in this estate or in any other action or proceeding in which this question may be presented for decision.

This is an appeal taken by the executor of the last will and testament of Benigno Barreiro, deceased, from a portion of an order of the superior court of San Diego county, settling its fourth annual account, in which order the executor was directed to pay out of its own funds into the treasury of the Compania the sum of $4,782.95, and also the sum of $500, out of the funds of the estate. This is a companion case with one bearing the same title, Estate of Barreiro (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 1017, wherein the minors appealed from the same order, the opinion in which case is referred to for a more complete statement of the facts than is here incorporated, and a discussion of some questions of law which we find it unnecessary to repeat.

After the death of Benigno Barreiro and the appointment of appellant's predecessor as the executor of his last will and testament, there were found among the effects of the deceased 1,000 shares of the capital stock of the Compania made payable to bearer. The then executor caused a meeting of the stockholders of the Compania to be held in Mexico on July 9, 1925, at which time a new board of directors was elected with Norman R. Morison, who was trust officer of the executor and in active charge of the estate, elected as president, and Lewis J. Utt, then the attorney for the executor, named among the directors. The then executor and its successors have ever since continued in control of the affairs of the Compania.

The order of the trial court requiring the executor to pay moneys into the treasury of the Compania is based upon its finding that charges made by attorney Manuel Lujan of Mexico for professional services rendered and expenses incurred were unjust, excessive, and no proper charge against the deceased, the Compania, or the estate. The task of the trial court in determining the correctness of these charges was made more difficult by the fact that Lujan, prior to the hearing that resulted in the order under consideration, left his home, has not been heard from since, and is presumably now dead. Mr. Utt, who acted as attorney for the executor and American adviser for the Compania during all of the time covered by the Lujan account, is also dead. Therefore, the testimony of these two witnesses which would have been most desirable was not available.

While appellant makes several separate specifications of error upon which it relies for a reversal of that portion of the judgment of which it complains, practically all of them may be stated and considered under one head, namely: Has the probate court of California, having jurisdiction over the estate of the deceased, the right to examine the conduct of the executor in managing the affairs of a Mexican corporation and charge it with expenditures made by it for or through the corporation? This question does not seem to have been directly answered by any of the cases decided in California. The respondents seek to justify the action of the court below upon the theory that the executor possessed the control of all of the stock of the Compania and the complete management of its affairs, using it only as its alter ego, and that therefore the court could look through the corporation and examine the actions of the executor and its officers, as though the corporation did not exist. The argument of respondents in support of the order in question is based upon the assumption that the deceased was the sole and only owner of all of the stock of the Compania and all of the property standing of record in its name. They urge that the corporation after the reorganization meeting of July 9, 1925, ceased to have any actual existence in so far as the management of its properties and affairs was concerned, and served only as a fictitious name under which the executor managed and operated the properties in Mexico. The deceased at the time of his death had possession of all the certificates of stock in the corporation.

It is true that in some instances a court may look through the form of a corporation in order to reach the sole owner of all of the stock when that owner attempts to transact his business in the name of the corporation as his alter ego. There must be a unity of interest and ownership between the two individualities, and such a state of facts that would perpetrate a fraud and work an injustice upon an innocent party by the recognition of the existence of the corporation separate and apart from the identity of the individual owning all its stock and operating through it, to justify such an action by the court. Minifie v. Rowley, 187 Cal. 481, 202 P. 673; Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 227 P. 723.

[2, 3] The first question to be considered is the legality of the reorganization meeting held on July 9, 1925, at which a new board of directors was elected for the Compania. As we have observed, the stock in the corporation was issued to bearer and was in the possession of the executor. The right of possession of only that portion of the stock belonging to Mr. Barreiro vested in the executor at the time of its appointment.

Section 313 of the Civil Code, as it existed prior to the amendments of 1931, provided that "shares of stock of an estate of a minor, or insane person, may be represented by his guardian, and of a deceased person by his executor or administrator." This section has been construed to give the right to executors to vote stock belonging to their testators upon exhibiting a certified copy of letters testamentary without formal transfer of the shares on the books of the corporation. Smith v. San Francisco, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 584 at page 591, 47 P. 582, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119; Market Street Ry. Co. v. Hellman, 109 Cal. 571, 42 P. 225. Of course, this right given to the executor to represent the stock of the deceased at any meeting of stockholders of the Compania could only extend to such stock as was owned by Mr. Barreiro at the time of his death. The executor could not represent the stock owned by Mrs. Barreiro, if any, without authority from her.

There seems to be no great difference between the rules of descent established by the Mexican law and those prevailing in California. The estate of a deceased person in both jurisdictions descends to the heirs subject to administration. Article 3232 of the old Mexican Civil Code, stated to be article 1286 of the new Code; article 3235 of the old Civil Code, stated to be article 1290 of the new Code; article 3173 of the old Civil Code, stated to be article 1990 of the new Code; article 3703 to article 3706 of the old Civil Code and articles 3726, 3727 of the old Civil Code consolidated in article 1704 of the new Code. Articles 3728, 3729, and 3730 of the old Mexican Civil Code, re-enacted into articles 1704, 1705, and 1706 of the new Code, give the executor such powers as are authorized by law and by the testator in a will or those which the heirs expressly give him, and no others. In the will admitted to probate the Southern Trust & Commerce Bank was given charge of the heritages of the children of Mr. Barreiro and the desire was expressed that Eustaquio Valle continue carrying on the business of the Compania as he was doing prior to the death of deceased. Under this power in the will, which seems to be permitted under the provisions of the Mexican Civil Code, it is argued with some force that the executor possessed the same rights to represent the deceased and his children in voting the stock of the Mexican corporation that it would have possessed under the authority given by section 313 of the Civil Code of California had the Compania been a California corporation. For the purpose of this opinion we will assume, without holding, that such powers were given to it.

Article 204 of the Commercial Code of Mexico provides that the call for meetings of a corporation shall be made by the board of directors, or by the examiners, and that more than one-half of the capital stock must be represented. Article 205 of the same Code provides that the calls to general stockholders' meetings shall be made by a notice published in the official journal of the state, district, or territory wherein the corporation has its domicile, and that the notice must contain a statement "of the proceedings for the day, or of all questions to be submitted for the deliberation of the meeting. Every resolution adopted in contravention of this article shall be void." These rules were not all followed in calling the meeting, nor in calling any of the other stockholders' meetings held after the death of Mr. Barreiro. No calls for these meetings were published in the official journal of the state. If we were to give literal interpretation to the provision of this section, that "every resolution adopted in contravention of this article shall be void," we would be forced to the conclusion that all proceedings taken at these meetings were void for not alone lacking the authority of law, but as being taken contrary to the express provisions of law.

The by-laws of the Compania provided that calls for general stockholders' meetings must be signed by the president or by the commissary and be published for at least ten days in advance of such meeting. The by-laws further provided that, when all of the capital stock is represented, a meeting may be held without the necessity of a call. Mr. Uribe, a Mexican attorney called as an expert on Mexican law, testified that the provisions of the Commercial Code would prevail over those of a by-law.

The trial court was of the opinion that as all of the stock of the corporation was actually represented at the meeting of July 9, 1925, including the stock of Mrs. Barreiro, if any, those participating in the meeting would be estopped from contesting its legality and that the directors elected at such meeting would at least be the de facto directors of such corporation and entitled to act as such until removed from office by a proceeding instituted by an authority other than that of one of those participating in the meeting. Guaranty Loan Co. v. Fontanel, 183 Cal. 1, 190 P. 177; Dolbear v. Wilkinson, 172 Cal. 366, 156 P. 488, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 1001; San Buenaventura Mfg. Co. v. Vassault, 50 Cal. 534; Guaranty Loan Co. v. Treadwell, 53 Cal. App. 538, 200 P. 653. We have been referred to no opinion of any one learned in the law of Mexico and to no decision of a Mexican court upon this question.

At the time of the meeting of July 9, 1925, Mrs. Barreiro was represented there by Messrs. Herman Freese and Stephen Connell, who were her attorneys. The minors were represented by their guardian, and the executor bank was represented by its trust officer and by Mr. Lewis J. Utt, its attorney in the probate proceedings. The minutes of this meeting recite that all of the stock of the Compania was represented as follows: Eustaquio Valle, 1 share; Norman R. Morison, 1 share; Stephen Connell, 1 share; Anton J. Schreiber, 1 share; M. G. Richardson, 1 share; D. M. Plaister, 1 share; Lewis J. Utt, 994 shares. The minutes recite that Morison was named president of the meeting and Valle its secretary and that Messrs. Connell and Utt were named inspectors to count the number of shares and votes. Messrs. Morison, Richardson, Schreiber, Connell, and Utt were elected directors, and Morison and Utt were elected president and secretary respectively. The by-laws were amended by making Tia Juana as well as Mexicali an authorized place for holding the corporate meetings. These minutes were protocalized before a Mexican judge of the first instance and were recorded in the registry at Tia Juana, Mex. The Mexican law provides that the certificates of stock of a corporation must be actually and physically present and exhibited at a stockholders' meeting. It is doubtful if this provision was complied with at this meeting, or at any of the other stockholders' meetings.

From what we have said it is apparent that the meeting of July 9, 1925, was not legally called and held, and that, if the proceedings there had are to be considered binding upon the stockholders, it must be because of the doctrine of their estoppel to question the legality of the meeting because of their participation therein. If they be estopped to question the legality of this meeting, at least Mrs. Barreiro is not estopped from questioning the legality of any subsequent meeting, either of the stockholders or of the board of directors, if she be considered a stockholder. No call or notice of any subsequent meeting was given and she did not participate therein. Her attorney, Mr. Connell, was removed as a member of the board of directors.

[4] The Mexican law vests the management of the affairs of a corporation in its board of directors much as does the law of California. No meeting of the board of directors seems to have been held. All the business of the corporation which was referred by the executor to any meetings seems to have been referred to stockholders' and not to directors' meetings. The questions of sales of properties, execution of leases, and other matters of policy, when considered at all, were considered at stockholders' meetings which were not called in accordance with the law of Mexico. The stockholders of a Mexican corporation seem to be given no power over the details of its management under the law of Mexico. Two of the trust officers of the executor made vague references in their testimony to meetings of the board of directors held in the town of Tia Juana or perhaps in Mexicali. That these meetings were anything more than informal gatherings of some or all of the persons acting as directors does not appear. The trial judge in two voluminous opinions filed by him makes the statement that no directors' meetings were held. The minute books and other Compania records were before him. While we cannot give this statement the dignity or effect of a finding, its truth seems to be borne out by the record. We have carefully searched the bill of exceptions in the appeal now before us and the long typewritten record in the appeal taken by the minors and have found no minutes of directors' meetings, although meetings of the stockholders are set forth at length. If the directors ever assembled in Mexico at other than stockholders' meetings, it seems apparent that their convocations were so informal as not to justify any minute record of their proceedings. As far as the record goes no meetings of the board of directors, as the term is known in the law, were held. Therefore, it follows that whatever was done in the name of the corporation after the meeting of July 9, 1925, was done, not only without the authority of law, but in direct violation of the provisions of the Mexican Code.

The attitude of the executor in regard to the Compania and the management of the Mexican properties is clearly reflected in its first annual report and account, where it is said: "Your petitioner, immediately upon its appointment, proceeded to reorganize the said Mexican corporation, and to assume full control and active management thereof. The assets of said Mexican corporation, in addition to securities and personal property held on this side of the line and amounting to some $99,500, consisted of real estate, both improved and unimproved, as well as of mines and of partnership interests in mining and oil ventures and claims, all of said property being located in the northern district of Baja California. The said real estate is located at Tia Juana, at Mexicali and St. Algodones, a small town on the Colorado river opposite Yuma. The collection of rents from said real property, and the execution of leases to tenants has involved and does involve a high degree of attention, as well as responsibility. Your petitioner has had to handle considerable sums of money from this source, as well as to carry on all the business of the decedent, a business which engrossed his entire time, and which consisted of looking after his Mexican interests."

These statements were made in connection with a request for extra compensation for its services in managing the Mexican property. The executor's trust officer was in the active charge of the administration of the estate and was also president and general manager of the Compania. If the trust officer had rendered these services in his capacity as an officer of the corporation he should have sought his compensation from the Compania and not from the estate. $3,000 as compensation for these extra services was allowed and paid to the executor out of the estate funds.

The books of the Compania were kept by the executor bank and consisted of little more than a cash account. Rents from the Mexican tenants were often paid to the executor and deposited in the estate funds with appropriate cross entries in the Compania cash book. It cannot be doubted but that the income of the Compania was expended by the executor alone and that the policy of leases and sales of property were dominated by it.

The Mexican Commercial Code requires that corporations keep an elaborate set of books in forms particularly specified. No effort was made after the death of Mr. Barreiro to keep any such set of books and no attention was paid to any of these requirements.

It cannot be doubted that the executor dominated and controlled all of the affairs of the corporation following the death of Mr. Barreiro. It chose one board of directors and then proceeded to brush aside its authority and administer the properties of the corporation. The only function performed by the Compania seems to have been that of holding the naked title to the Mexican property. The executor brushed aside the legal entity of the corporation and assumed direct control of its property and its affairs.

The question, therefore, which presents itself may be stated as follows: Can the executor, after having disregarded the corporate existence and corporate entity, and having failed to observe the provisions of law of the republic of Mexico regarding the functioning of a corporation, and having taken direct charge of the corporate property, hide behind the corporate entity which it did not recognize over a period of years and thus protect itself from losses occasioned by its direct management of the properties of the Compania? The question would seem to contain its own answer.

In this opinion all references to the Code of Civil Procedure are made to that Code in effect before the adoption of the Probate Code.

We are next confronted with the question of the jurisdiction of a probate court of California over property owned in Mexico by the Compania which was taken possession of and administered by an executor appointed by the California probate court without any ancillary letters having been issued in Mexico. Section 1913 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the authority of an executor or administrator does not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the government under which it was given its authority. The rigorous jurisdictional limitation of the powers of an executor imposed by this section has been somewhat modified by many decisions sustaining the right of an executor to collect debts due the estate in other jurisdictions when such collections can be made without suit. 12 Cal. Jur. 238, 239, and cases there cited.

[5] It is well settled in California that superior courts have both probate and equity jurisdiction and that, where necessary to do justice to all parties concerned, the probate courts may exercise equity jurisdiction. Estate of Maxwell, 74 Cal. 384, 16 P. 206; Estate of Burton, 93 Cal. 459, 29 P. 36; Verdier v. Roach, 96 Cal. 467, 31 P. 554, 557; Toland v. Earl, 129 Cal. 148, 61 P. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Bell, 168 Cal. 253, 141 P. 1179; Estate of Glenn, 153 Cal. 77, 94 P. 230; Bauer v. Bauer, 201 Cal. 267, 256 P. 820; Estate of Heeney, 3 Cal. App. 548, 86 P. 842; Estate of Hill, 94 Cal. App. 113, 270 P. 708. In Verdier v. Roach, supra, it was said: "Our superior courts have both probate and equity jurisdiction, so that whenever, in the course of the administration and settlement of estates, our probate statutes are found to be inadequate to authorize and accomplish all that a court of equity is authorized to do in such cases, our superior courts may exercise their equity powers in connection with, and as incidental to, their powers in probate matters, to the extent necessary to a complete administration and distribution of estates: provided, of course, that nothing be done in contravention of any statutory provision."

[6] It has long been the rule in equity that where a court has jurisdiction of the person it may enforce a decree in personam although it could not enforce it in rem. Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Vesey Sr. 443 (27 English Reports, Reprint, p. 1132); Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148, 3 L. Ed. 181; Arglasse v. Muschamp, 1 Vern. 75; Tollor v. Carteret, 2 Vern. 494; Phelps v. McDonald, 99 U. S. 298, 25 L. Ed. 473; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 606, 22 Am. Dec. 669; Miller & Lux v. Rickey (C. C.) 127 F. 573; State v. Cronan, 23 Nev. 437, 49 P. 41; 5 Cal. Jur. 471, § 44; Smith v. Davis, 90 Cal. 25, 27 P. 26, 25 Am. St. Rep. 92; Peninsular, etc., Co. v. Pacific S. W. Co., 123 Cal. 689, 56 P. 604; Taylor v. Taylor, 192 Cal. 71, 218 P. 756, 51 A. L. Cronan, supra, it was held that the courts of Nevada, having obtained personal jurisdiction over the parties therein, had the right to inquire into and determine the powers of a California corporation, its officers, and stockholders, under the laws of California, and question the validity of the corporate acts although the courts of Nevada had no jurisdiction over the corporation itself.

[7] For many years it has been held in California that where a California executor has taken charge of and gathered in assets of an estate in a foreign jurisdiction it may be held accountable for them. Estate of Ortiz, 86 Cal. 306, 24 P. 1034, 1035, 21 Am. St. Rep. 44; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 339, 24 P. 855, 26 P. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474; Estate of Grivel, 199 Cal. 351, 249 P. 184, 185; Reed v. Hollister, 44 Cal. App. 533, 186 P. 819. The rule is stated in Estate of Ortiz, supra, as follows: "I think the law applicable to the facts is correctly stated by Prof. Schouler, in his late treatise on Executors and Administrators (2d Ed. 1889, § 175), as follows: 'The earlier rule frequently asserted in England, in one loose form or another, is that assets in any part of the world shall be assets for which the domestic executor or administrator is chargeable; the practical effect being to enjoin upon the principal personal representative the duty of procuring, so far as foreign law and the peculiar circumstances will permit, personal assets wherever situated, realizing the bulk of the estate of his decedent as best he may, gathering in the property as one who represents the whole fortune, and, having gathered it, account to those interested accordingly. Some of the judicial expressions on this point, to be sure, import too onerous a responsibility on the representative's part; and Mr. Justice Story has pointed out the fallacy of holding a domestic executor or administrator answerable for foreign property which it is admitted that he can neither collect nor sue upon, nor compel its payment or delivery to himself by virtue of his domestic appointment,—foreign property, we may add, of whose existence, or of the grant of foreign administration for realizing it as assets, he may be quite unaware. And yet, to let external assets knowingly escape his control, and be lost to the estate, when with reasonable diligence they might have been procured, seems a plain dereliction of duty in the principal or domiciliary representative, whose function, as rightly understood, is to grasp the whole fortune, as the decedent did during his life, save so far as the obstructive law of foreign situs, or the limitations of his own appointment, may restrain him.'"

Estate of Grivel, supra, is quite similar in fact to the one at bar. The deceased had property in the republic of Mexico and in the United States. He had a former wife and children. There was this difference, that probably there were ancillary probate proceedings in Mexico. The appeal was taken by the domiciliary executor from an order surcharging his accounts. In the course of the opinion the court said: "Appellant admits that he did sell about 1,600 head of cattle, collected debts owing decedent from persons residing or doing business in Mexico, and transacted other business in said foreign territory, but claims that in so doing he acted solely as attorney in fact for said [ancillary] administratrix, and not in his official capacity as administrator of said estate. He further admits that moneys derived from the sales of property made in Mexico, and which passed into his hands, were deposited by his direction in a bank situate in Calexico, county of Imperial, where the business of the estate was transacted by him. It is the insistent claim of appellant that he was acting in two separate and distinct capacities in handling the funds and property of an estate of which he was the domiciliary administrator, to wit, as agent or attorney in fact of the ancillary administratrix of all property which had its situs in Mexico at the time of decedent's death, and as administrator only of such property as had its situs in the state of California at the time of decedent's death, and to no further extent. We question the soundness of this contention. Appellant was the administrator of the entire estate and of all the funds and property which came into his hands which was admittedly property and moneys belonging to the estate, and it was clearly his duty as such officer to report and account to the court which had appointed him for all moneys and property belonging to the estate which he received into his possession, and it does not matter what the source may have been. We think as a general proposition that the court has inherent power to compel a report of the property which has passed into the hands of the domiciliary administrator, even though he claims to have remitted it to the ancillary administrator."

Reed v. Hollister, supra, also involved the necessity of a local executor accounting for funds coming into his possession from a foreign jurisdiction and the power of the probate court to require him to account for such funds. After a careful consideration of the case, the court reached the conclusion that the probate court had such jurisdiction and that the executor must account to it for such funds.

[8] We have reached the conclusion that the probate court had the jurisdiction to require the executor of the estate of Barreiro to account to it for the Mexican property of which it took control and which it virtually removed from the possession of the Mexican corporation which owned it, and correctly required the executor to render an account of all of the transactions which it conducted in connection with the Mexican property standing in the name of the Compania.

The order of which the executor complains on this appeal is a virtual surcharge of its account in the sum of $4,782.95, on account of moneys paid to and collected by Manuel Lujan. Mr. Lujan, an attorney at law of the republic of Mexico, was apparently the personal attorney of Benigno Barreiro and for the Compania before Mr. Barreiro's death. He acted also as the Mexican adviser to the executor of the estate. The items of the account, showing charges and receipts as summarized by the trial judge, are as follows:

"For services rendered prior to Mr. Barreiro's death, as per statement of June 20th, 1925 (Executor's Exhibit N-2), as follows:
1. Trip to Mexico City re certain appeals pending against the Compania and the City of Mexicali as well as the Galeana case	$ 1,300.00
2. Cardinale attachment	1,775.00
3. Attachment on real property of Paul Kittiquitz	650.00
4. Two suits against the Compania Commercial	500.00
5. Appeal in a criminal case involving Mr. Barreiro	500.00
6. Consultations with Mr. Barreiro, stated to have been not less than 100 in number	1,000.00
7. Drawing up documents and papers	200.00
Total	$ 5,925.00
For services to Compania for the 12 months ending June 6, 1926, as per statement (Executor's Exhibit O-2) of that date, at $350.00 per month	$ 4,200.00
Personal expenses during that year	250.00
Compensation for the two months ending August 6, 1926, as per statement dated November 30, 1926 (Executor's Exhibit P-2)	700.00
Compensation and expenses on trip to Mexico City in summer and fall of 1926, amounting apparently to	2,100.00
(Balance the two remittances to him for that purpose of July 27th, 1926, and September 11th, 1926, respectively, hereinafter referred to.)
Making an aggregate of	$13,375.00

As against these charges he has admittedly been paid:

By Mr. Barreiro in his lifetime (see Executor's Exhibit N-2)...	$ 100.00
Other items as shown by said supplement to the Executor's Fourth Account:
November 5, 1925.....	600.00
December 4, 1925.....	500.00
July 27, 1926 (re Lujan's trip to Mexico City).....	600.00
August 19, 1926.....	400.00
September 11, 1926 (re Lujan's trip to Mexico City).....	1,500.00
(I do not count a transmission charge on last item of $32.95 in this connection.)
December 8, 1926.....	500.00
Also collections in which Executor's Exhibit O-2, Lujan admits having made and retained as follows:
13 months' rent from the Compania Commercial on the Mexicali and Tia Juana properties affected by the lease litigation, at $450.00 per month	5,850.00
Interest on the so-called Johnson note	325.00
Aggregating	$10,375.00

This accounting, if correct and complete, would still leave due to Lujan..... $ 3,000.00

The account as revised and allowed by the trial court is as follows:

Lujan admits, according to his statements (Executor's Exhibits N-2, O-2 and P-2), as hereinbefore reviewed, an aggregate of..	$10,375.00
This, however, includes what he collected by way of interest on the Johnson note, an account which was apparently not property of the Compania de Inversiones, and should, therefore, have nothing to do with his accounting with it.....	325.00
This leaves of money of the Compania de Inversiones for which he admits being accountable....	$10,050.00

As we have also seen, he is chargeable also with the $591.68 collected by him through the Cardinale escrow; but since there has been reserved for the future the question of whether he has earned anything in connection with the Cardinale litigation, the question whether this debit of $591.68 is to be offset against any such charge may properly be reserved, and the disposition of said $591.68 item reserved also. Neglecting this item for the present, then, we consider the credit side of his account generally.

He is credited with:

Expenses in trip, January and February, 1925, to Mexico City, amounting altogether to sixty days.....	$1,200.00
Fees in suits against the Compania Commercial	500.00
Consultations with Benigno Barreiro regarding Compania affairs and drawing up documents relative to same.....	200.00
Fourteen months' services as consulting Mexican attorney for the Compania de Inversiones subsequent to Mr. Barreiro's death	2,100.00
Personal and traveling expenses for ten days in trips to Mexicali..	200.00
Personal and traveling expenses for thirty days in summer and fall of 1926 in trip to Mexico City.....	600.00
Making an aggregate of.....		4,800.00
This left him indebted to the Compania de Inversiones to the extent of		$ 5,250.00"

To the balance of the account just quoted and charged against the executor the court added the sum of $32.95, costs paid on sending money to Lujan in Mexico City

The items of which appellant complains are those credits either disallowed or reduced. Ruling was reserved on the charge of $1,775 for the Cardinale attachment, and $591.68 collected through escrow. We have considered the right of the probate court to reserve ruling on items of an account in Estate of Barreiro (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 1017. This portion of that opinion is referred to for a discussion of this question and it will not be necessary to repeat it here.

[9] The court below disallowed the charge of $650 for an attachment on the real property of Paul Kittiquitz. It appears that this grew out of a claim against one Johnson alleged to be due to the Compania Merchantil Internacional, a corporation formerly controlled by Mr. Barreiro, which he placed in the hands of a liquidator for the purpose of liquidation. It is evident that this particular claim for services could not be made against the executor or the Compania, but against the Compania Merchantil Internacional or the liquidator. The trial court reserved a ruling upon the question of a settlement between the executor and the liquidator and this item can undoubtedly be adjusted when that matter is determined.

The charge of $1,000 for not less than 100 consultations by Barreiro with Lujan, and the $200 for the drawing up of documents and papers by Lujan will be considered together. On November 19, 1924, Lujan executed a receipt to the Compania whereby he receipted for $500 in full for his services, both to the Compania and to Mr. Barreiro up to that date and agreed to make no further charge for services to be rendered by him in the two appeals pending in the Supreme Court in the City of Mexico, one on a petition of Miguel Galeana in which the Compania was a third party, and the other an appeal presented against the municipal council of Mexicali. This receipt was dated about seven months prior to the death of Mr. Barreiro. The trial judge was of the opinion that the charges were excessive and were not supported by proper evidence. In this we agree with him. He allowed $200 for these services, which we cannot hold was an unreasonable compensation under the circumstances disclosed by the record.

Lujan presented a bill for services rendered the Compania for fourteen months at the rate of $350 per month. On account of the death of Mr. Utt, and the apparent death of Mr. Lujan, the evidence as to just what these services consisted of is very meager. The trial court found that some services were performed consisting of consultations with Mr. Utt as attorney for the executor and the Compania and that the reasonable value of the services rendered was $150 per month. We think the allowance quite liberal under the circumstances and cannot hold the trial court in error in fixing the compensation at this sum.

[10-13] The account of Lujan contains three items of traveling expenses, one on a trip to Mexico City concerning the two appeals pending there which we have mentioned, which trip occupied sixty days; another, compensation and expense on a trip to Mexico City in the fall of 1926 in connection with the same two appeals which occupied thirty days, and the third, expenses of trips to Mexicali, which occupied ten days. The total amount claimed by Lujan for these items was $3,850, which the court held to be excessive and not justified by the evidence. In so far as they included any compensation for services rendered in connection with the two appeals the correctness of the ruling of the trial court in excluding such charges from the account cannot be questioned in view of the receipt given by Lujan on November 19, 1924. The trial court allowed him traveling expenses of $20 per day for each day occupied on the trips to Mexico City and to Mexicali. The receipt of Lujan did not contain any agreement not to make a charge for traveling expenses and a reasonable allowance to cover such expenditures was undoubtedly correct. We think the sum of $20 per day fixed by the trial court for this purpose was ample and that it cannot be questioned by us. These allowances made by the trial court are supported by competent evidence in the record and as the question is merely one of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the ruling of the trial court, its conclusion becomes final.

[14] Appellant urges that the probate court had no authority to direct that the sum of $4,782.95 be paid out of the private funds of the executor into the treasury of the Compania, but only had authority to surcharge the executor's account with this amount and direct it to be paid into the estate funds. This money was withdrawn from the treasury of the Compania by the executor without any authority from the board of directors or any lawful procedure. The trial court was undoubtedly correct in directing it to be returned to the source from which it was taken.

[15] Appellant maintains that the finding of the trial court to the effect that the executor failed to use due diligence, prudence and care in its transactions with Lujan, and that Lujan was overpaid and was permitted to retain more money than he was reasonably entitled to, due to the negligence of the executor, is not supported by the evidence and is contrary to it. It relies upon the rule that where the executor exercises its best judgment and due care and prudence in the selection of an agent or attorney who is well recommended, it is not liable for money lost by the insolvency of the agent unless the executor was negligent and careless in its dealings with him. 24 Cor. Jur. 126; Estate of Taylor, 52 Cal. 477. Appellant particularly urges that it should not be chargeable with the sum of $5,850, thirteen months' rental from the Mexicali and Tia Juana properties, nor with overpayments to Lujan on account of his trips to Mexico City.

The real properties from which the rentals were collected were the ones involved in an action instituted by Mr. Barreiro to cancel leases held by the Compania Commercial. See opinion in Estate of Barreiro (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 1017, for further particulars. When the suits were instituted the rents were paid into court. Lujan, as the attorney of record in these cases, in some manner obtained possession of the money, retaining it when he disappeared, which was some considerable time later. During the time that this money was in his possession, the executor did not seek to have him pay it into the treasury of the Compania, where it rightfully belonged, nor in any manner did it seek its recovery. The trial court concluded, and we think correctly so, that the loss of this money was directly traceable to the executor, who, over a considerable period of time, failed to collect from Lujan, and seemingly acquiesced in his retention of this money.

[16] Appellant urges that it was not negligent in overpaying Lujan on account of his expenses and services rendered on the two trips to Mexico City, because, at the time the payments were made, it did not have actual knowledge of the receipt which Lujan had executed on November 19, 1924. The evidence discloses that this receipt was found among the papers of Mr. Barreiro, of which the original executor took possession at the time of his death. No good reason appears why the executor by the exercise of reasonable diligence could not have acquainted itself with the contents of this receipt long before it made any of these payments to Lujan. We think its negligence is apparent in both instances and that the court properly directed it to replace the money lost as a result thereof.

[17, 18] Appellant next complains that the trial court wrongfully placed upon it the burden of proving the correctness of its accounts rather than placing upon the contestants the burden of proving that the accounts were not correct. In this contention we cannot agree with appellant. The amount of evidence which a probate judge may require of any executor in support of the correctness of any account is largely a matter of his own discretion. Where there is no contest it is the duty of the trial court to satisfy itself of the correctness of the account, and, within the limit of reason, it may require the executor to produce such evidence as will satisfy it in this respect.

The portion of the order approving the final account, appealed from by the executor, is affirmed.

READING v. MARR ESTATES, Inc.

Civ. 8658.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 5, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐907(3).

When appeal is based on judgment roll alone, appellate court must assume that findings were supported by evidence introduced at trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Sarah C. Reading, a widow, against the Marr Estates, Inc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Mitchell, Silberberg & Davis and C. R. Montgomery, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Willedd Andrews, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J.

The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to obtain relief by reason of alleged fraud practiced on her in a transaction involving the purchase of certain real estate. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and, from the judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed and has brought up a transcript containing the judgment roll alone.

The defendant asserts that a vendor is not in default until he has failed to perform after a demand for performance. The contention, under the record presented, is immaterial. In the first place, it assumes that the action is one based on contract, whereas the complaint sounds in tort. In the second place, the judgment roll does not disclose whether a demand was or was not made. When an appeal is based on the judgment roll, we must assume that all of the findings were supported by the evidence introduced at the trial.

It is next contended that the vendor's delivery and the vendee's acceptance of the erroneous deed did not excuse the necessity of demand for performance. Our reply to the first contention is a complete reply to this one also.

It is next asserted that, if the delivery of the erroneous deed was performance of the contract, the vendee has no right to recover the purchase money. The point is axiomatic, however; it is not addressed to the record before us. In effect the trial court found that the erroneous deed was delivered fraudulently, and for that reason it rendered its judgment against the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Criminal law ⇐982.

Trial court could modify terms of probation, within limits.

2. Criminal law ⇐982.

Modification of probation order under which accused, who pleaded guilty of issuing checks without sufficient funds, had been placed in sanitarium, so as to serve year of probationary period at county road camp, held authorized.

The facts disclosed that court must have believed accused to have been laboring under a mental difficulty, since he ordered him confined by physician in a private sanitarium for treatment, and also that he believed him to be responsible for his criminal acts, and, after receiving physician's report that defendant was cured, court modified terms of probation by ordering that next year of probationary period be served at county road camp.

Habeas corpus proceeding by Harry Glick against the Sheriff of Los Angeles County.

Writ denied.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem.

This is a petition for the issuance of the writ of habeas corpus on behalf of one Harry Glick, who is confined in the county jail or in the road camp under restraint of the sheriff of Los Angeles county. Glick was charged by information of the crime of forgery in two counts. One for forging a name to a bank check for $5; and one for the sum of $25. He pleaded not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity to both counts. When the cause was called for trial, an amended information was filed which repeated the above charges but added two more based upon the same acts. The two new counts charged Glick with issuing checks without sufficient funds. He was arraigned on the amended information, and Glick pleaded guilty to the counts charging issuing checks without sufficient funds and not guilty to the forgery charges. He then asked and received permission to file an application for probation. At this session of the court the judge presiding made it clear that the first information and the arraignment thereunder was entirely superseded by the so-called amended information and arraignment thereunder, and both Glick and his counsel agreed thereto. Some question had been raised as to Glick's sanity, but, after hearing from a physician who had examined him, the court remanded him to the sheriff.

At a later session the court ordered Glick to be examined for his sanity, but, upon being reminded that he had already been under observation, ruled that Glick should be granted probation. The terms of probation were for five years, conditioned that the probationer should be "turned over to Dr. Moore for Dr. Moore to keep in his sanitarium. When Dr. Moore is satisfied that he should be released from the sanitarium that he communicate with the probation officer, who, in turn, will obtain a court order to that effect." The other counts to the information were then dismissed. No sentence was ever pronounced.

A few weeks after making the order of probation, the court made the following order: "Dr. D. S. Moore having reported that defendant is cured, terms of probation are modified as follows: It is ordered that the next year of said probationary period, defendant shall serve at the county road camp." This order was made without notice to Glick or his attorney, and neither was present when the order was made. Thereafter Glick's attorney moved to vacate the plea of guilty and to substitute therefor the plea of "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity." This was denied. He thereupon moved that Glick be released on bail, and this motion was denied.

It is a certainty that the court believed Glick to be laboring under a mental difficulty, for he ordered him confined by a physician in a private sanitarium for treatment. It is just as certain that the court believed him to be responsible for his criminal acts. The court was faced with a problem, and solved it in a way that seemed the most humane. A border line case, he accepted a guilty plea, mercifully saved him from a felon's cell by granting probation, and provided treatment. Later he gave the offender a taste of punishment. The only part of this program that can be criticized from a legal standpoint is the requirement that the probationer be restrained in a sanitarium. This course might well be abused, and we have no doubt but that it was error and does not meet with our approval. But it is too late to invoke this writ for that, as he is not now so confined.

[1, 2] The court had a right to amend or modify the terms of probation within limits, and the modification was within these terms. Expressions, though probably dictum, in People v. O'Donnell, 37 Cal. App. 192, 174 P. 102, are illuminating.

We conclude that there is no showing here that Glick is now illegally restrained of his liberty. Should there ever be any question as to his sanity, a complaint may easily be laid and that issue tried. Section 1367, Pen. Code; People v. Scott, 59 Cal. 341. It can readily be seen by the language of this opinion that it would be profitless to comment specifically on the denial of the motions to substitute a plea and to be released on bail.

The petition that the writ of habeas corpus issue is denied.

1. Contempt ⇐66(1).

Judgment of contempt being final is not appealable but resort must be had to other remedies (Code Civ. Proc. § 1222).

2. Habeas corpus ⇐92(3).

Where contempt proceeding is attacked by habeas corpus and record is not produced, jurisdiction must be determined from judgment itself, and facts recited therein must be taken as true.

3. Habeas corpus ⇐85(3).

Attorney attacking contempt proceeding by habeas corpus had burden of showing as matter of law that restraint was not legal.

4. Criminal law ⇐728(1).

Right to make objections to argument or assignments thereon may be waived in whole or in part.

5. Stipulations ⇐3.

Attorneys could lawfully stipulate that defendant would be entitled to reserve and have benefit of exceptions that it might be lawful for him to make during course of prosecutor's argument.

6. Contempt ⇐6.

Recitals in judgment that attorney entitled to exceptions by stipulation, contrary to court's order and in loud and contemptuous voice and insolent manner interrupted district attorney's argument held to support adjudication of contempt (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1209, 1211, 1222).

> Judgment recited, in substance, that counsel for defendant in a criminal prosecution, contrary to the court's direction, interrupted and continued to interrupt the closing argument of the district attorney; that such interruptions were unnecessary, since counsel was entitled to all objections by stipulation; that the manner, method, and tone of voice in refusing to cease making such interruptions was extremely loud, boisterous, and contemptuous; and that the conduct of counsel in manner and method was disorderly and contemptuous, and tended to and did interrupt the judicial proceedings.

Application by Vincent W. Hallinan for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco.

Writ discharged; petitioner remanded.

William F. Herron, C. K. Bonestell, and W. Earl Shafer, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Joseph A. Garry, Deputy Dist. Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent.

KNIGHT, Acting P. J.

While acting as attorney for the defendant in a criminal case the petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court. He has applied for a writ of habeas corpus. In his return the sheriff sets forth that he holds the petitioner by virtue of a judgment and commitment reading as follows, to wit:

"Be it remembered, that on this 2nd day of September, 1932, in the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, in Department 12 thereof, the Honorable Frank H. Dunne presiding, in the above-entitled matter, the defendants Albert Tinnin and Frank J. Egan being charged by grand jury indictment with the crime of a felony, to wit, murder, then regularly on trial, the defendant Tinnin appearing personally and through his attorney Nathan C. Coghlan, Esq., and the defendant Egan appearing personally and through his attorney Vincent Hallinan, Esq.

"That during the course of said proceedings, and during the closing arguments to the jury which were then being made by the District Attorney, on behalf of the People of the State of California, the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., contrary to the order and direction of the Court theretofore made, interrupted and continued to interrupt the said closing arguments and presentation of the case then being made by the said District Attorney;

"And be it further remembered, that there was no necessity legal or otherwise for said interruptions by said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., for the reason that pursuant to the order of said court theretofore made, and pursuant to stipulation and agreement theretofore made by the District Attorney and said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., as attorney for defendant Egan, it was not necessary either to interrupt the closing arguments of said District Attorney or to enter any objections or exceptions thereto, or to any part or portion thereof, having been notified by the Court and stipulated by the District Attorney that he would be entitled to reserve and have the benefit of any and all possible exceptions that it might be lawful for him to have and make during the course of the argument, and that the defendant Egan could be deemed to have objected and excepted to any and all parts and portions of said closing arguments,

"And be it further remembered, that despite the lack of necessity therefor, and despite said order and stipulation, the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., did interrupt and did continue to interrupt the arguments of said District Attorney,

"And be it further remembered, that the manner, method and tone of voice of the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., in refusing to cease making said interruptions were extremely and unduly loud, boisterous, harsh, offensive and contemptuous, and

"Be it further remembered, that the aforesaid conduct of said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., in manner, tone and method, was disorderly, contemptuous, and that his attitude and behavior toward this Court, while the Court was holding said session, was insolent, and that the same tended to and did interrupt the due course of the trial and the said judicial proceedings which were then and there in progress, and that the said conduct of the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., was boisterous and that it did breach the peace of said judicial proceedings, and the same did create and was a violent disturbance of said judicial proceedings, and the same tended to and did interrupt the due course of the said trial and proceedings as aforesaid, which then and there was in progress.

"Now therefore, this court being fully advised of the law in the premises, finds as matters of fact that all of the above acts and conduct of the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., above recited took place in open court, and as a conclusion of the law therefrom, the Court finds that the same constituted a contempt of the authority of this Court.

"Wherefore, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed by this Court that by reason of the speech and conduct of the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., and the findings of fact of this Court, that he, the said Vincent Hallinan, Esq., be and he is hereby committed to the custody of the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, for the period of twenty-four hours.

"Done in open Court this 2nd day of September, 1932.

"Judge of the Superior Court."

[1-3] It will be observed that the proceeding involves a direct contempt; that is, one found to have been committed in the immediate view and presence of the court. In this regard, section 1209 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares that any of the following acts or omissions in respect to a court of justice, or proceedings therein, constitutes contempt of the authority of the court: 1. Disorderly, contemptuous, or insolent behavior toward the judge while holding court, tending to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceeding; 2. A breach of the peace, boisterous conduct, or violent disturbance, tending to interrupt the due course of a trial or other judicial proceeding. Section 1211 of the same Code provides that, where a contempt is committed in the immediate view and presence of the court or judge at chambers, it may be punished summarily, for which an order must be made reciting the facts as occurring in such immediate view and presence, adjudging that the person proceeded against is thereby guilty of a contempt, and that he be punished as therein prescribed. As to the finality of judgments of contempt, it is held that the same are "subject to review only upon the point of jurisdiction" (Otis v. Superior Court, 148 Cal. 129, 82 P. 853), which is but a restatement of the provisions of section 1222 of said Code that "the judgment and orders of the court or judge, made in cases of contempt, are final and conclusive." Being final, a judgment of contempt is not appealable. The party aggrieved must resort to other remedies. See 5 Cal. Jur., pp. 954, 955. When certiorari is invoked, the record of the entire proceeding upon which the contempt is based is brought before the reviewing court; but when, as here, the attack is made by way of habeas corpus, and the record of the proceedings is not produced, the question of jurisdiction must be determined from the judgment itself, and the petitioner is not allowed to go behind the facts and matters recited therein for the purpose of impeaching or contradicting them; they must be taken as true (In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 478, 480; Ex parte Ewell, 71 Cal. App. 744, 236 P. 205; Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 198, 19 P. 380, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263); and the burden is upon the petitioner to show as a matter of law that the restraint which is apparently legal is not so (In re Clarke, 125 Cal. 388, 58 P. 22). In our opinion petitioner in the present proceeding has failed to sustain such burden.

[4, 5] Cases have been cited by him to the effect that there can be no contempt of a void order; others to the effect that, unless counsel for a defendant in a criminal action objects to the statements made by the district attorney in his argument to the jury and makes appropriate assignments of error at the time such statements are made, the defendant is precluded from urging the point on appeal as ground for reversal; and petitioner contends, therefore, that in order to protect the interests of the defendant here it was not only his right to interrupt the argument of the district attorney for the purpose of making such objections and assignments, but that it was his duty so to do; and that the "necessity" for such interruptions was a matter for him to decide and not the trial court. Conceding all of this to be true, it is equally well settled that the right to make any such objections or assignments may be waived (16 Cor. Jur. 914); and it needs no argument to demonstrate that what may be waived as a whole may be waived in part. Here no unqualified waiver is shown, but as will be noted the judgment of contempt recites that petitioner entered into a stipulation and agreement with the district attorney that at the conclusion of the arguments of the district attorney the defendant Egan would be entitled to reserve and have the benefit of any and all possible exceptions that it might be lawful for him to have and make during the course of the argument, and that the defendant Egan could be deemed to have objected and excepted to any and all parts and portions of said closing arguments. The subject of the agreement was a matter about which the parties might properly stipulate (23 Cal. Jur. 813; 36 Cyc. 1285), and it is held generally that a stipulation made in open court as this one was "constitutes not only an agreement between the parties but also between them and the court, which the latter is bound to enforce * * *" (23 Cal. Jur. 811); and even though a party, after entering into a stipulation, is allowed under certain circumstances to withdraw therefrom, it does not appear that petitioner ever asked permission so to do. Therefore, so far as the record before us shows, the trial court did not exceed its jurisdiction in seeking to enforce as against petitioner the stipulation theretofore made by him.

[6] Regardless, however, of the legal effect of said stipulation, and assuming that, after having entered into the same, petitioner had the right to repudiate it and interrupt the argument of the district attorney for the purpose of objecting thereto, he was nevertheless required to do so in a respectful and orderly manner and in keeping with the common rules of decorum and propriety, which, according to the recital of facts set forth in the judgment, he did not do. To repeat, the trial court found in this respect that the tone of petitioner's voice in refusing to cease making said interruptions which, according to the judgment, were made continually, was extremely and unduly loud, boisterous, harsh, offensive, and contemptuous; and that his conduct was disorderly and contemptuous, and that his attitude and behavior toward the court while holding said session was insolent, all of which tended to and did interrupt the due course of the trial which was then and there in progress; that said conduct was boisterous and did breach the peace of said judicial proceedings and create a violent disturbance, thereby interrupting the due course of the trial. Therefore, whether or not petitioner had the right to interrupt said proceedings for the purpose mentioned, it is apparent that the manner in which he conducted himself in seeking to exercise such right brought him clearly within the operation of the provisions of said section 1209, and subjected him to punishment for contempt.

[7] Petitioner contends, however, that the matters set forth in the judgment bearing upon his behavior are merely the conclusions of the trial court which are referable only to the fact that he interrupted the argument of the district attorney in violation of the court's order; and that therefore such conclusions must be disregarded in determining the legal sufficiency of the judgment. We are unable to agree to such contention. Under all the authorities it is held that a contempt may be shown either by language or behavior, and that although the language itself may not be contemptuous, it may become so if uttered in an insolent or defiant manner; and in determining whether the language used was a contempt, regard must be had not only to the very words used but to the surrounding circumstances, the connections in which they were used, the tone, the look, the manner, and the emphasis. 13 Cor. Jur. 7; 6 R. C. L. 491. As said by Lord Denman, C. J., in Wilson's Case, 7 Q. B. 984: In contempt cases "it becomes the unfortunate duty of a court to act as both party and judge, and to decide whether it has been treated with contempt. We cannot decide upon the face of this return that they have come to a wrong conclusion. A court may be insulted by the most innocent words, uttered in a peculiar manner and tone. The words here might or might not be contemptuous, according to the manner in which they were spoken: and that is what we must look to. If the words might be contemptuously spoken, that was an ample occasion for the decision of the royal court with which no other court can meddle. Every court in such a case has to form its own judgment." In the same case Williams, J., stated as follows: "It is quite obvious that contempt may be shown either by language or manner. We can imagine language which might be perfectly proper, if uttered in a temperate manner, but might be grossly improper if uttered in a different manner. No one not present can be a competent judge of this." The Supreme Court of Indiana in Holman v. State, 105 Ind. 513, 5 N. E. 556, quoted the above statements with approval. Furthermore, according to the code commissioner's note, our section 1209 was taken originally from the Minnesota statute, and the Supreme Court of that state in the case of State ex rel. Leftwich v. District Court, 41 Minn. 42, 42 N. W. 598, in construing the statute, said: "While we have jurisdiction to review an order punishing for a criminal contempt the decision of the court making it is not to be lightly reversed. The opportunity of the court, in whose presence an alleged contempt is committed, to know and determine whether the acts or words were done or said in disregard and contempt of its authority is vastly greater than we can have from merely reading the record of such acts or words. Acts or words, when stated in writing, may appear to have been entirely innocent, but may have been done or spoken in such a manner as to have been in the highest degree a breach of the respectful conduct due to courts when in the discharge of their duty, and of the decorum and good order that ought to be observed in their presence to enable them to properly perform their functions. For this reason we do not think we state the rule too strongly when we say that an order adjudging a criminal contempt ought not to be reversed unless it is so apparent that no contempt was committed as to indicate that the court exercised its authority capriciously, oppressively and arbitrarily." In other words, as aptly stated by our own Supreme Court in Otis v. Superior Court, supra, "every court is the exclusive judge of its own contempts." And in this state, even in criminal cases where the accused is charged with disturbing the peace under section 415 of the Penal Code, which declares, among other things, that every person who maliciously and willfully disturbs the peace or quiet of any neighborhood or person "by loud or unusual noise, or by tumultuous or offensive conduct * * * is guilty of a misdemeanor," it has long since been held that a complaint charging the offense in the language of the statute is legally sufficient to sustain a judgment of conviction. In re Deusing, 178 Cal. 205, 173 P. 930; Ex parte Foley, 62 Cal. 508. Therefore in the present case, it appearing from the judgment that the contempt consisted, not in the use of language which in itself was offensive, but in the contemptuous tone of voice in which it was spoken, accompanied by disorderly behavior, it is difficult to conceive, and petitioner on oral argument was unable to point out, wherein the trial court could have been more explicit in describing the volume, tone, accent, and inflection of petitioner's voice and manner of speech than by saying as it did that it was extremely and unduly loud, boisterous, harsh, offensive, and contemptuous; or could have better pictured his attitude and behavior toward the court than by saying that it was insolent, contemptuous, boisterous, and disorderly to the extent of creating a violent disturbance and breach of the peace, all of which interrupted and interfered with the orderly progress of the trial. As was said in Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, 308, 9 S. Ct. 77, 81, 32 L. Ed. 405: "A breach of the peace in facie curiæ is a direct disturbance, and a palpable contempt of the authority of the court. It is a case that does not admit of delay, and the court would be without dignity that did not punish it promptly, and without trial."

In support of his contention on this point petitioner cites and relies mainly on the decision rendered in the case of In re Shortridge, supra, wherein the court said: "It is true that the order does state in general terms that his conduct was boisterous and offensive; but, reading this statement in connection with the context in which it occurs, it is clear that the order means no more by this than to state a conclusion from the fact that he persisted in addressing the court against the order of the court. So the question involves the single proposition: Does the simple fact that an attorney for a party to an action pending before the court, while a witness is being examined, persists in addressing the court, although admonished not to do so, constitute a contempt of court? We think it does not." But continuing, the court said: "For aught that we can see from the order, the petitioner may have been rightfully and respectfully discharging his duty. * * *" (Italics ours.) It will be seen, therefore, that the judgment of contempt in the present case contains much more than the order in the Shortridge Case, because here it affirmatively appears from the judgment that petitioner was neither rightfully nor respectfully discharging his duty. But aside from the differentiating element mentioned, it would seem that the decision in the Shortridge Case is contrary to the views expressed by the courts of a number of other states having similar statutes. For example, in the case of State ex rel. Leftwich v. Superior Court, supra, arising in Minnesota, from whence our Code section 1209 was taken, the petitioner was examining a witness and had asked several questions of the same general character to which objections had been sustained. The relator proceeded in making similar offers. He was warned to discontinue. He did not do so. Thereupon a judgment in contempt was entered. Addressing itself to these facts, the Supreme Court said (page 599 of 42 N. W., 41 Minn. 42): "A counsel trying the cause of his client has, of course, rights as the representative of a suitor and as an officer of the court which must be respected; but those rights can never extend to disregarding or disobeying the rulings and orders of the court. If that were permitted the trial of a cause might become a mere farce. If he thinks a ruling against him is erroneous he can do his duty to and save the rights of his client by taking an exception. That is the only orderly and proper way to avoid the effect of an erroneous ruling. To permit the counsel, after the court has decided that a question or a particular course of examination is improper, to persist in renewing substantially the same question, or in continuing that course, would incur the danger of the trial becoming a contest of endurance between the court endeavoring to prevent a course of examination that it deemed improper and the counsel endeavoring to follow such a course, notwithstanding the ruling of the court. A counsel who would intentionally attempt such a mode of conducting a trial, especially after being warned by the court to desist, and that it would consider persistence in it a contempt, would undoubtedly be guilty of a contempt. The court, in order to have the power to promote dispatch of business and an orderly and intelligent conduct of a trial, must have the power to summarily prevent such a thing." Again, in Holman v. State, supra, the facts showed that the petitioner was engaged in cross-examining a witness. The court sustained an objection. The petitioner arose to his feet and proceeded to argue the question that had been ruled upon. He was directed to take his seat. He declined to do so, and it was held that the facts sustained the judgment of contempt. Two of the numerous other cases arising under similar circumstances, wherein the judgment of contempt was sustained, are Russell v. French, 67 Iowa, 102, 24 N. W. 741, and In re Mindes, 88 N. J. Law, 117, 95 A. 743.

[8] Moreover, in our opinion the decision in the Shortridge Case reached the limit of authority of a reviewing court to interfere with the power of a trial court to be "the exclusive judge of its own contempts," because in the absence of the statutory enactments above referred to, which are but declaratory of the common law (Ex parte Terry, supra; 4 Bl. Comm. 286), every court of general jurisdiction has the inherent power to punish for contempt, of which it cannot be deprived even by the Legislature. In this regard the Supreme Court of this state in an early case said: "No authority has been found which denies the inherent right of a court, in the absence of a limitation placed upon it by the power which created it, to punish as a contempt an act, whether committed in or out of its presence, which tends to impede, embarrass, or obstruct the court in the discharge of its duties. It is a doctrine which is admitted in all its rigor by American courts everywhere, and does not need the support of foreign authorities, based upon the fiction that the majesty of the king, represented in the persons of the judges, is always present in the court. It is founded upon the principle—which is coeval with the existence of the courts, and as necessary as the right of self-protection—that it is a necessary incident to the execution of the powers conferred upon the court, and is necessary to maintain its dignity, if not its very existence. It exists independently of statute. The legislative department may regulate the procedure and enlarge the power, but it cannot, without trenching upon the constitutional powers of the court, and destroying the autonomy of that system of checks and balances which is one of the chief features of our triple-department form of government, fetter the power itself." In re Shortridge, 99 Cal. 526, 34 P. 227, 229, 21 L. R. A. 755, 37 Am. St. Rep. 78. Therefore in the present case, if we should hold absolutely meaningless, as petitioner contends we should, the entire portion of the judgment dealing with his manner of speech and his behavior, we would be not only unduly extending the effect of the decision in the Shortridge Case, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 478, but we would be doing indirectly, by a process of judicial interpretation and decision, that which the legislature may not do directly or at all, namely, nullifying the inherent power of the trial court in this particular case to punish as a contempt a breach of the peace in facie curiæ which the trial court declared impeded, embarrassed, and obstructed the court in the discharge of its duties. To so hold would be of course to exceed our own jurisdiction.

We find nothing in the cases of In re Lake,

65 Cal. App. 420, 224 P. 126, Curran v. Superior Court, 72 Cal. App. 258, 236 P. 975, 979, or Platnauer v. Superior Court, 32 Cal. App. 463, 163 P. 237, 242, which conflicts with the views herein expressed. The Lake Case has no pertinency whatever because it did not involve the question of behavior of counsel during the progress of trial, merely his liability for punishment for contempt for inserting certain matter in an affidavit charging the judge with bias and prejudice. The Curran and Platnauer Cases were reviewed on certiorari and consequently the records of the entire proceedings were before the reviewing court; and the decisions therein go no farther than to hold that the fact that an attorney may speak in a loud, combative, and contentious tone of voice, and happens to be persistent and vehement or both in the presentation of his points, does not constitute a contempt, "so long," says the court in the Platnauer Case, "as his language is not offensive or in contravention of the common rules of decorum and propriety." In this latter respect the court in the Curran Case expressly points out "that the [trial] court in its order does not find that the manner in which the acts were done was disorderly, contemptuous, or insulting to the court * * *"; and in the Platnauer Case the court said (page 475 of 32 Cal. App., 163 P. 237, 242): "It does not appear from the facts as they are here disclosed that the petitioner at any time addressed the court in disrespectful language. On the contrary, he appears to have proceeded with full consciousness of the duty which an attorney owes to a court, and, when adjudged guilty of contempt, had merely interposed a suggestion in respectful language. * * *" And continuing on the court fully recognizes the fundamental principle that every court is vested with inherent power to punish for disorderly and insolent behavior, the court saying: "Every court has the right to protect its dignity by compelling litigants and attorneys appearing before it to conduct themselves with decorum and in a respectful manner and the proceedings of a trial in an orderly way. With this right necessarily attends the power to coerce decorum and decent conduct on the part of the parties and their counsel, and to compel them to demean themselves in a manner befitting the dignity of courts of justice. And the power should, on all proper occasions, be unsparingly exercised and applied, to the end that the courts, which represent in the highest form the majesty of the law, shall be accorded that respect to which the sacredness of their functions and their high dignity entitled them."

For the reasons stated it is our conclusion that the recital of facts set forth in the judgment in the present case in its entirety is legally sufficient to support the trial court's adjudication of contempt. Therefore the writ is discharged and the petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

I concur: STURTEVANT, J.

CASHIN, J.

I concur in the order discharging the writ and remanding petitioner. While I am satisfied that the facts found in the commitment cannot well be distinguished from those of In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 P. 478, that case in my opinion not only reached but went beyond the limit of authority; and to the extent that it can be said to hold that a finding that the conduct and language of one addressing the court was boisterous and offensive, and interrupted the orderly conduct of the proceeding before the court, is insufficient to show contempt within the meaning of the law, it should no longer be followed.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem.

The decedent, M. A. Hamburger, sometimes known as Mose Hamburger, died in Los Angeles county October 29, 1930. A document in form a witnessed will, executed August 18, 1930, was in due time presented to the probate court as his last will and testament, and without contest was admitted to probate as such. Later, Jennie Hamburger Marx, a sister of decedent, instituted a contest in which she asked that the probate of said document be revoked, basing her action on two grounds, to wit: (1) That at the time the deceased executed the will in question he was not mentally competent to make a will; (2) that said will was procured to be executed under the undue influence of D. A. Hamburger and his wife, Katherine Hamburger. The case went to trial before the court with a jury, and at the conclusion of contestant's case a motion for nonsuit was made as to each cause of action on the ground that no evidence had been produced which would justify the cause being left to the jury for decision. The court granted the motion as to each cause and contestant appeals from the ruling.

The estate involved is large and substantial. The will was long, and contained trust provisions. In reciting the facts necessary to a consideration of the case, we quote in part from appellant's opening brief under the caption "Statement of the Evidence," adding thereto as we think proper, and designating the same by use of brackets: "The deceased at the time of his death was 71 years old. He had been a well known merchant and for many years prior to his death had resided in Los Angeles, when he was not traveling. He was very active in business and in other matters, and until his last few years was a man of apparent robust health. [Decedent was a close associate in business with his brother, D. A. Hamburger, continuously for many years and up to the time of his death.] He was a bachelor and was survived by one brother and three sisters. One brother is married and has three children, all living and mentioned in the will of the deceased. One of the sisters was never married; the other two were. * * * the contestant is the mother of Mrs. Florence Hellman, who is not mentioned in the will of the decedent; neither are her children. * * * There is no necessity of setting forth here any fact in the life of deceased preceding 1927. In that year he suffered a brain concussion in a fall from a streetcar. The accident had slight effect on the deceased at the time but did cause his memory to become poor and clouded his mentality. [This lasted two or three hours while he was in the receiving hospital, although he was conscious at all times. The police surgeon testified that concussions might be temporary or permanent, and that he knew nothing of the effect of the accident on Mr. Hamburger after he saw him at the hospital. There is testimony that Mr. Hamburger went out that night to a party.] In the spring of 1928 the deceased visited Palm Springs and while there suffered a stroke of paralysis or spasm of the arteries, coming from hardening of the arteries. [This thickened his speech, confused his mind and caused him to fumble in the use of his hands.] He recovered rapidly and was removed within two weeks to Los Angeles in an ambulance. Before returning he had recovered so that his speech was clear, his mental faculties clear and normal and fumbling had practically disappeared. During 1928 and 1929 deceased traveled to Europe and there took treatments for his heart trouble. [While there he was subject to emotional outbursts without normal cause.] In January, 1930, he sailed for the Orient, and while on this trip was ill. He returned in April and went to the home of his sister [Mrs. Nathan], where he remained convalescing from his illness. His condition improved for a time after his return, but in the early part of September one of his attending physicians believed his condition to be hopeless. During his illness from April to the date of his death Doctors Leland Potts Hawkins, Donald Jackson Frick and Dudley Fulton attended him. Dr. Dudley Fulton is dead." This closes the general statement.

There can be no possible question from the evidence that decedent was mentally able to make a testamentary disposition of his estate up to his return from the Orient in April of 1930. We shall therefore analyze the testimony concerning his mental status subsequent to that date, always, of course, remembering the history to such time.

Dr. Fulton, who treated decedent prior to April of 1930, is dead, and we have only the testimony of Dr. Hawkins, a younger associate of Dr. Fulton, as to decedent's illness from that date to his death. His examination was brief, and the cross-examination was strictly limited. Dr. Hawkins first called on decedent in April of 1930, because Dr. Fulton was away. His testimony as to Mr. Hamburger's illness was similar to that of Dr. Frick, but shorter. The treatment described by him was about the same as described by Dr. Frick. He testified that deceased was given a little less medicine in July than in May, and about the same in August as in July.

Dr. Donald Jackson Frick was called on the case April 22 and attended decedent practically every day to May 23d. According to his testimony, the patient had a chronic degenerative condition of his heart muscles; some swelling of legs and feet; shortness of breath, not painful but distressing. Treatment was codeine; some morphine for sleeping and shortness of breath; morphine was discontinued shortly; improved in May. Dr. Fulton returned, and Dr. Frick was not called again until September 3d; thereafter called upon decedent September 3d, 4th, 6th, 8th, 10th, and 13th; found patient back about same as in April; heart disease had progressed; resumed old treatment; patient had good and bad days; thought case hopeless. On cross-examination, the witness said, "As far as I could see, at any time I saw him, he was mentally clear," and testified that the patient carried on conversations very well on various subjects; that morphine and other drugs for sleeping would be effective for from four to six hours; that the drugs given patient were not sufficient to have any effect upon the mentality other than the effect of producing sleep.

Mrs. Florence M. Hellman is a daughter of decedent's sister Mrs. Marx, the contestant herein, and is the mother of three children. She testified that decedent looked bad upon his return from the Orient; that she went to Europe six weeks later, returning early in August of 1930, from which time on she saw decedent often until his death; that he had failed during her absence; that he habitually lay back with eyes closed, trying to listen to what was said; would very often doze off regardless of who was in the room, occasionally making a remark; that her children would come in several times each week and his eyes would beam, and he would say, "Hello sweetheart"; that when not in pain he would seem to be interested and would listen to her narrative of European travels; that, at a birthday party at the Nathans for Mrs. Marx and decedent on August 28, 1930, decedent came to dinner not fully dressed; ate little, talked little, and was affected to tears by presents given him; the dinner lasted from 7 to 10 p. m., but decedent did not remain continuously at the table; that moving pictures were shown, but he could not enjoy them; that after that he never got up and dressed, but would lie propped up in bed by pillows, suffering and dozing off; that he would get short of breath, groan, grab the foot of the bed, and sway until relieved; that in September he sometimes would make remarks apropos of the conversation; that at times he would try reading a paper, then fall back, close his eyes, and the paper would fall. In October the witness' visits were fewer and of shorter duration.

The testimony of Mrs. Marx was essentially the same as that of Mrs. Hellman. She testified that after August decedent was given hypodermic injections quite frequently, during September once or twice a day; that he did not talk much, but smoked; that in October he grew worse, had attacks "continually all the time"; that she saw him every day in October; that he may have been conscious, but was dozing most of the time; that he was not conscious his last week.

Mr. Isi Klingenstein, a friend and relative by marriage, testified that after the oriental trip decedent seemed sleepy and drowsy most of the time, would fall asleep; that he saw him every three or four days; that he got weaker during August; that he "always talked to him, tried to talk to him"; that in September he was getting worse; "he couldn't leave the house; just several days he was feeling good and the next day he was sick again."

Louis J. Friedman testified that D. A. Hamburger told him in May of 1930 that "Mose is under the influence or spell of opiates and he is suffering all the time. Mose is going down hill very fast. We have given him dope day and night." In June decedent had a wild look in his eyes; he was shrunken. "He didn't appear to be as rational. Dave said, 'He is going down hill very fast.'" The witness at that time was in decedent's room about two minutes.

About two months before decedent died, a former chauffeur of his was called in to help move him in a wheel chair, and decedent failed to recognize him and got excited.

Miss Evelyn Hamburger, youngest sister of decedent, testified that she received a message in Europe in June, 1930, signed "Brother," saying, "Come home if you wish to see your brother alive"; that she arrived home July 1st and saw decedent that evening; that he was emaciated and very weak; that he talked of Europe and various things; that he said, "I feel pretty good"; that she saw him every day in July; that "he would get up for a few hours"; that she stayed with him from morning until afternoon and then in the evening; that decedent went down town in July, but that she tried to prevail upon him not to go because he was very weak; that he wanted to talk, but the doctors discouraged it; that he was not improving in August, but grew weaker, slept a good deal; he went down town on August 28th, his birthday, and sat as the dinner table awhile; "Oh, I don't know that he went down [town] very much in August, because it was very warm, and we tried to prevail upon him not to go too much"; that in September the injections were more frequent, made him drowsy; that in October, three or four days before his death, decedent had hallucinations; that in the beginning he was conscious quiet a good deal, but later he dozed a good deal in the middle of the day; that he listened to the radio, stock market news and "Amos and Andy." On cross-examination, the witness testified:

"Q. Right up to pretty close to his death he was interested in those things, was he? A. I think so. He listened to sport events right up to close to his death.

"Q. Did he read the newspapers a lot? A. Toward the end he was unable to, and I used to say to him, 'Don't bother about the paper just now.'

"Q. Do you mean the last week or two? A. Yes. Mose went to Silverberg's office about August 1st and then Silverberg came to the house two or more times.

"Q. In fact, really, it wasn't until the very last couple of weeks that M. A. began to more or less lose interest in things; isn't that true? A. Yes. He had to be advised all along about being careful and not to go down town."

On the question of competency, D. A. Hamburger testified in a general way that decedent was interested in affairs generally and in business up to within a few days preceding his death.

Dr. Frank M. Mikels, a mental and nerve specialist, replied to a hypothetical question: "Yes, in all reasonable certainty this man was of unsound mind." The doctor's testimony shows clearly that an "unsoundness of mind," as considered by him, was a technical term used to differentiate such a condition from a perfectly normal mind, and was not at all the soundness of mind required of a person when executing a legal testamentary disposition of his worldly goods. The hypothetical question itself was indefinite in several important elements, including the extent of the concussion and paralysis, amount of medicines, and how often given.

A hypothetical question was put to another medical expert, Dr. Samuel D. Ingham, who answered as follows: "I would think that there was very definite impairment and disturbance with emotional reaction. I don't know how to answer in regard to whether he was of sound mind or not, because soundness of mind is a relative term. It would be my opinion that his mind was limited in its scope, in its capacity, and his emotional balance was disturbed so that his mind was not working at its greatest efficiency."

The following quotation from the opinion in Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161, 170, 113 P. 130, 134, a case in which motion for nonsuit had been granted, is very pertinent: "We are herein not unmindful of the testimony of the physician who declares, under the promptings of a hypothetical question too long to be repeated, his belief that the deceased was insane. But his testimony goes no further than this. This court recently, in Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 227, 86 P. 695 [9 Ann. Cas. 795], was called upon to discuss the value of expert opinion evidence given under such circumstances, and declared it to be 'in the eye of the law of steadily decreasing value.' But giving to the evidence under the circumstances of the nonsuit, as we must, the fullest weight to which it is entitled, it is but a declaration of the belief of the physician that from a medical standpoint she was insane. It is not accompanied nor followed by any evidence showing the extent or nature of the insanity, and, as hereinbefore pointed out, the insanity which the physician believed he had found could have well co-existed with full testamentary capacity." See, also, Estate of Purcell, 164 Cal. 300, 128 P. 932, point 4, Estate of Collins, 174 Cal. 663, 670, 164 P. 1110, and Estate of Flint, 179 Cal. 552, 177 P. 451, holding that opinion evidence of unsoundness of mind rises no higher than the reasons given for the opinion.

Much of the testimony above referred to was given to show a mental weakness on the part of decedent. Such testimony should be read in the light of the opinion in the recent case of Estate of Bemmerly, 110 Cal. App. 550, 294 P. 33. In this connection, also, the following language from the opinion in Estate of Casarotti, 184 Cal. 73, 192 P. 1085, 1087, is pertinent: "It must be borne in mind that it is not every weakness and impairment of the faculties of the testator that will invalidate a will. Even where a testator is feeble in health, suffering under disease and aged and infirm, yet if he was of sufficiently sound mind to be capable of understanding the nature and situation of his property, and of disposing thereof intelligently, without any delusions affecting his action, he had sufficient capacity to make a will. * * * It was held that the fact of the testator being unable to speak articulately, and was compelled to communicate by signs, did not raise a legal presumption of incompetency to make a will. Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 415, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441."

[1] Without here attempting to draw a fine technical definition of a nonsuit and without trying to harmonize the several leading cases upon the subject (and we confess that there are statements in the opinion in Estate of Ivey, 94 Cal. App. 576, 271 P. 559, with which we do not entirely agree), we think the following expresses the problem before us, in so far as the question of mental incapacity is concerned: Is there any substantial testimony that decedent was so mentally incapacitated on the 18th day of August, 1930, that he could not have understood the contents of the document which he signed on that day as his last will and testament? We think there is no such testimony. Decedent was an experienced business man, and had drawn or executed several complicated wills. In this will he had the services of an attorney. He was a sick man, but he was able to converse and to take an interest in things throughout August of 1930, the month in which the will was executed. He grew worse after August, and yet he continued almost to his death to interest himself in many things. There is no evidence that the will was executed while decedent was under the influence of drugs. Furthermore, not every person who is given sedatives to comfort him in illness or opiates to induce a night's rest is necessarily incompetent to execute a will. Estate of Fraser, 177 Cal. 266, 170 P. 601, Estate of Bemmerly, supra. The following words from In re Ferguson's Estate, 239 Mich. 616, 215 N. W. 51, 54, may well be applied to the instant case: "The technical wording of the will was the exercise of professional art by an attorney, and it was not at all essential that the testatrix comprehended the legal phraseology with the eye of a lawyer, but sufficient if she fully comprehended what was accomplished thereby. Few people understand the technical language of a deed, and were understanding of its technical words the test of mental capacity of the grantor few deeds could stand. Underlying the words employed by the lawyer in the will is the simple meaning readily understandable by a layman."

[2] It seems to us, also, that the evidence is entirely lacking as to the alleged undue influence of Mr. and Mrs. D. A. Hamburger. D. A. Hamburger was educated for, and many years ago did perhaps a little practicing at, the law. Assume that he did advise with his brother in former wills; assume that he did draw a will or a form of will for one of his relatives; that the will in question was more to his and his children's advantage than former wills of decedent; assume that the last will of decedent was more to the liking of D. A. Hamburger than the preceding wills of his brother; that it left to one of the sisters property for life only and did not mention grand nieces and nephews for whom decedent had shown much love and affection; assume that D. A. Hamburger was greatly displeased with the fact that decedent was going to change one of his former wills and that he had created a scene over it, and that this had been communicated to decedent; assume that D. A. Hamburger was present when the new will was executed, along with other witnesses—assuming all of this, and there is supporting evidence in the record, yet the evidence clearly shows that decedent was mentally competent on August 18, 1930, to execute a will; that, notwithstanding the fact that contestant and other witnesses were in the testator's company during his illness a much greater time than were the D. A. Hamburgers, no word or even a suspicion as to any undue influence by anybody had been produced. It seems to us that the evidence shows that the contestant entertained but a suspicion of undue influence, unfounded in fact so far as shown by the testimony produced. "Proof, to establish undue influence, must be had of a pressure which overpowers the mind and bears down the volition of the testator at the time the will is made. It consists in the exercise of acts or conduct by which the mind of the testator is subjugated to the will of the person operating upon it. Estate of Holloway, 195 Cal. 711, 235 P. 1012; Estate of Anderson, 185 Cal. 700, 198 P. 407. Mere proof of opportunity to influence a testator's mind, even when coupled with an interest or motive to do so, will not sustain a finding of undue influence, in the absence of testimony showing that there was pressure operating directly on the testamentary act and to such an extent as to affect the terms of the testament. Estate of Fleming, 199 Cal. 750, 251 P. 637; Estate of Bryson, 191 Cal. 521, 217 P. 525. It is not sufficient for a contestant merely to prove circumstances consistent with the exercise of undue influence, but, before a will can be overthrown, the circumstances proved must be inconsistent with voluntary action on the part of the testator. Estate of Morcel, 162 Cal. 188, 121 P. 733." Estate of Donovan, 114 Cal. App. 228, 299 P. 816, 818. See, also, Estate of Presho, 196 Cal. 639, 238 P. 944, and Estate of McDevitt, 95 Cal. 17, 30 P. 101.

The entry of judgment for costs was not erroneous. The motion for nonsuit was properly granted.

KUGLER v. SCARBOROUGH et al.

Civ. 983.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Sept. 26, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐193(6).

Allegations of mutual mistake in making reconveyance held good against objection for uncertainty made for first time on appeal.

2. Quieting title ⇐44(4).

Evidence held to support finding that purchaser on execution sale was not bona fide purchaser.

3. Reformation of instruments ⇐45(5).

Evidence held to support finding that creditor was entitled to reformation of reconveyance made upon form for full reconveyance of property covered by trust deed, where partial reconveyance was intended.

4. Mortgages ⇐360.

Sale under trust deed may be conducted by trustee's attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Rose Kugler against Minnie Scarborough, Gertrude A. Woods, Ralph A. Woods, and Irene Johnson, wherein Minnie Scarborough filed cross-complaint against plaintiff and her codefendants. From judgment for cross-complainant, plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Raphael Dechter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Glen Behymer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment on an action to quiet title. Defendants Ralph A. Woods and Gertrude A. Woods, his wife, executed and delivered to defendant and cross-complainant Minnie Scarborough a promissory note for $3,000, secured by a trust deed covering two parcels of real property in Los Angeles county, to wit, a house and lot in the Los Angeles-McCarthy tract, and a lot and a half in the Redondo Villa tract. Defendant Irene Johnson was named as trustee in the deed of trust. Woods and his wife defaulted under the terms of the note and trust deed, and after some delay, the trust deed was foreclosed. Prior to the foreclosure of that trust deed a reconveyance was executed and delivered by the trustee, Irene Johnson, to Woods and his wife, describing only the Redondo Villa property, which they at once recorded. It is alleged that through the inadvertence and mutual mistake of the parties to the deed of trust that this intended partial reconveyance was made upon a form for full reconveyance and recited full payment of the indebtedness and release and reconveyance without warranty to the holder of the legal title when the deed of trust is executed and for the benefit of those lawfully succeeding thereto of all the estate described in the deed of trust and that this conveyance was given as satisfaction and discharge of the trust. It is further alleged that the reconveyance was made for a good and valuable consideration but without payment of any portion of the indebtedness secured thereby. Plaintiff held a judgment against defendant Ralph A. Woods, by virtue of which she caused an execution to be levied on the McCarthy tract property. It was then sold by the sheriff at execution sale and bid in by plaintiff. Her attorney testified he learned of the McCarthy tract property through a searcher's chain of title report furnished to him and that he personally examined the recorded reconveyance before he attended the sheriff's sale and bid in the equity of Ralph A. Woods in the property for his client. After getting the sheriff's deed, he wrote Ralph A. Woods of what had occurred and that before taking legal proceedings for possession, he would be willing to arrange with him to rent the property if he desired. In response to the letter Gertrude A. Woods called at his office and subsequently made a payment of $20 to the attorney inclosed in a letter in which she stated she would send more next month. She testified this payment of $20 was on the judgment indebtedness. This property was then sold at public auction under the trust deed foreclosure and bid in by cross-complainant. No further payments were made by Mrs. Woods to plaintiff's attorney and plaintiff then filed this suit to quiet title. All the defendants answered, and defendant Minnie Scarborough filed a cross-complaint alleging the mutual mistake and asking that the reconveyance and release deed be reformed to express the true intent of the parties. Judgment was in favor of cross-complainant reforming the deed as prayed for and decreeing that Minnie Scarborough was the owner in absolute fee simple of the premises and that plaintiff was forever barred from any and all claims of right or title to the property, or any lien thereon, or any part thereof.

[1] Appellant's first point on appeal is that the cross-complaint does not set forth with sufficient certainty the circumstances accounting for the mutual mistake made in the reconveyance. In the absence of special demurrer and a general objection not specifying these, but other grounds for the objection, we hold that the allegation is sufficient. 22 Cal. Jur. § 17, p. 732; Seegelken v. Corey, 93 Cal. 92, at page 95, 28 P. 849. Further, these grounds, as a basis of the aforegoing objection, are raised for the first time on this appeal.

"Where no objection is made at the trial to evidence on the score of defective pleading, the rule is well established that such a course is a waiver of a defective pleading." Beardsley v. Clem, 137 Cal. 328, at page 332, 70 P. 175, 176.

"* * * And if he objects on certain grounds, he cannot on appeal raise other objections to the complaint, which might have been obviated by timely amendment; as by pointing out particular objections he has in effect assured the adverse party that he will urge no other objection." 2 Cal. Jur. § 77, p. 254.

[2] Considering the point that plaintiff was a bona fide purchaser, it appears from the evidence that plaintiff's attorney personally examined the recorded reconveyance before bidding in the property at the sheriff's sale. In the case of Leonard v. Osburn, 169 Cal. 157, at page 160, 146 P. 530, 531, the court held: "While the description is erroneous, yet it may be expressed in such a manner, or may be connected with such attendant circumstances, that a purchaser is deemed to be put upon inquiry; and if he fails to prosecute this inquiry he is chargeable with all the notice he might have obtained had he done so." See, also, Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 P. 172, 25 P. 64, and O'Rourke v. O'Connor, 39 Cal. 442.

The inconsistency of the reconveyance was apparent on its face. It was clearly a patent ambiguity and parol evidence was admissible in an action praying for reformation. 22 Cal. Jur. § 23, p. 741.

Whether or not the evidence was sufficient to support a judgment of reformation is a question primarily for the trial court.

"The appellant insists that the evidence which will be sufficient to justify the reformation of a contract upon the ground of mistake must be clear and convincing. Assuming that the rule for which the appellant contends would have application to the attitude of the trial court toward cases of this character, we are satisfied that in this case there was clear evidence of a mistake, and whether or not it was convincing was entirely a question for the trial court." California Packing Corp. v. Larsen, 187 Cal. 610, at page 613, 203 P. 102, 103.

[3] The realtor and notary, J. T. Howard, testified the parties asked him to draw a reconveyance covering only the Redondo Villa tract lots and he prepared it thinking it covered only these lots. From an examination of all the testimony of the witnesses concerning how the mistake was made in the drawing of the reconveyance, we feel that the cross-complainant was entitled to the relief sought.

[4] The evidence does not sustain appellant's contention that the note and trust deed were never delivered and never operative. The sale under the trust deed was conducted by the trustee's attorney, which is allowable under the law of this state. Kennedy v. Dunn, 58 Cal. 339; Stockwell v. Barnum, 7 Cal. App. 413, at page 418, 94 P. 400.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

BURR v. GOODWIN.

Civ. 924.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Sept. 29, 1932.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨241.

Decree establishing due notice to creditors of estate is not conclusive in face of satisfactory evidence showing that publication of notice to creditors was insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1490).

2. Executors and administrators ⇨226.

Notice to creditors of estate to exhibit claims at administrator's office, not containing alternative provision for filing claims in office of clerk of court, held insufficient (Code Civ. Proc. § 1490).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1490 provides that every executor or administrator must cause to be published a notice to creditors of decedent requiring all persons having claims against decedent to file them in office of clerk of court from which letters were issued, or to exhibit them to executor or administrator at place of his residence or business specified in notice.

3. Judgment ⇨562.

Judgment rejecting creditor's counterclaim against estate in action by administrator because claim filed in estate did not contain copies of notes on which claim was based, held not to bar creditor from recovering in subsequent action on second claim presented to administrator on same notes and rejected.

Judgment rejecting creditor's counterclaim in action by decedent against creditor, in which decedent's administrator was substituted on decedent's death, did not bar present action since, in first action, merits of creditor's claim were not passed upon by court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; V. N. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Clyde R. Burr, as receiver of the First National Bank of Calexico, against R. N. Goodwin, as administrator of the estate of A. H. Goodwin, deceased. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

Philip Grey Smith and Clyde R. Burr, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

M. C. Atchison, of Calexico, for respondent.

MORTON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by the claimant from a judgment in favor of the administrator on a rejected claim.

Shortly prior to his death decedent filed an action against the appellant bank for charging and collecting usurious interest from him. R. N. Goodwin, as administrator, was substituted as plaintiff, and in its answer the bank pleaded certain promissory notes executed by decedent and held by the bank, as a counterclaim and set-off thereto. A claim on the notes had been presented to the administrator but he had not approved or rejected it at the time of the trial, although more than ten days had elapsed since the presentation of the claim. Judgment was for the plaintiff, and the court held that the amount of the notes was not available as a set-off because the claim filed in the estate did not contain copies of the notes. No appeal was taken from this judgment. A few days after the trial court had rendered its opinion and before judgment had been entered, the bank filed a new claim with the administrator, although more than ten months had elapsed since the first publication of the notice to creditors. This second claim was rejected by written notice, and suit was then filed thereon. Judgment was for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

[1, 2] Two points present themselves for determination: First, whether the form of notice to creditors was sufficient; second, whether the judgment in the former suit precluded the claimant from recovering in the present action upon the second claim filed.

The notice to creditors in the Goodwin estate, which is attacked by appellant as insufficient, directed "the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit the same with the necessary vouchers within ten months after the first publication of this notice to the administrator, at the law office of M. C. Atchison, 201 City Market Building, Calexico, California." The notice omits the alternative provision of allowing claims to be filed "in the office of the clerk of the court from which the letters were issued." Section 1490, Code Civ. Proc. The evidence does not disclose whether or not a decree establishing due notice to creditors had been granted in this estate. However, such a decree would not be conclusive in the face of satisfactory evidence showing that the publication of the notice to creditors was insufficient. Wise v. Williams, 88 Cal. 30, at page 34, 25 P. 1064. In holding that section 1491a, Code of Civil Procedure, must be strictly complied with, the Supreme Court said in Hawkins v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 743, 745, 134 P. 327, 328:

"This want of any information in the files of the estate itself of when and where publication was being made and when and to whom claims should be presented, doubtless prompted the Legislature to the enactment of section 1491a, which was intended to supply all this information by requiring that a copy of the published notice with a statement of the fact as to when publication began and in what paper should be of record in the estate within 30 days after the first publication. Parties interested in the estate whose right to act therein might be measured by lapse of time for the presentation of claims, and creditors whose claims required presentation within the given time would thus have early, direct, and full information by an inspection of the files of the estate, and could act accordingly. With this section 1491a complied with, parties interested would not be required to hunt up the whereabouts of the executor, administrator, or attorney of the estate, who might all be nonresidents of the county in which it was being probated, and whose particular places of residence or offices the files would not disclose, nor assume the task of perusing the newspapers of the various cities and towns of a county to ascertain in just which one the notice was being published. Ordinarily this task may not be a difficult one; but it was for the purpose of obviating any trouble or annoyance in the matter that the Legislature enacted section 1491a. This was the only possible purpose its enactment could subserve. While the wisdom of the Legislature in making this simple provision is obvious, still, if the claim of the petitioner is to obtain, that the filing of the notice which it provides for is merely directory, nothing has been accomplished at all, and the Legislature might have saved itself the trouble of the enactment. * * *

"Compliance with the section is so easy that there can be no reasonable excuse for its nonobservance, nor should its beneficent provisions be frittered away and rendered nugatory by a construction which treats it as merely directory. We are satisfied that both from the language used and the purpose to be attained it was intended that the section should be mandatory, and the superior court properly so construed it."

In Madruga v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 564, 226 P. 1, the notice to creditors provided that claims should be filed in the county clerk's office or exhibited to the executrix at a place of business outside the county in which the administration was pending. The court refused to disregard as surplusage the designation in the notice of a place of business outside the county at which claims might be presented, and held the notice to creditors was insufficient. Although it is not for us to question the reasons for the amendment of section 1490, Code of Civil Procedure, allowing claims to be filed in the office of the clerk of the court from which letters issued, it was undoubtedly the intent of the Legislature in adding this provision to afford to creditors and parties interested the same facilities as provided by the information available in said office under section 1491a, Code of Civil Procedure. If the option of designating only the county clerk's office, or only the office of the executor within the county was for the executor to decide, then a creditor, who did not carefully read all the newspapers of that county and had to go to the office of the clerk of the court to get information concerning when and where to present his claim, would be required to then go and hunt up the office of the executor to present his claim, which might be anywhere in the county. We cannot feel that the Legislature so intended. It must also be noted that the Code section states that the claim be filed "in the office of the clerk of the court from which the letters were issued, or to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, to the executor or administration," etc. When a claim is filed in the office of the clerk of the court a definite record is made of the matter. Many executors and administrators are not experienced in office routine and therefore the clerk's record might often prove the more reliable. Furthermore, this provision also tends to center probate proceedings through the office of the clerk of the court and allows the creditor to file his claim in the same office where he secured the necessary information. The time for filing claims during the administration of an estate is limited. If the creditor fails to present his claim within the time specified in the notice it is forever barred. Strict compliance must be required on the part of the estate, to justify the advantages which may inure to it thereby.

[3] Our second point is whether the judgment in the former suit precluded the claimant from recovering in the present action upon the second claim filed. After an examination of the record we fail to find any evidence that the first claim was ever approved or rejected by the administrator. If rejected, then no written notice of rejection was ever served upon the claimant as required by section 1498, Code of Civil Procedure, to start the statutory time running within which to file suit. In the prior action, wherein the first claim covering the notes was pleaded as a counterclaim and set-off, the court found that no sufficient claim including said obligations was ever presented to the administrator and therefore none of the affirmative defenses pleaded was available to the defendant in that action. This finding appears to be based upon the fact that copies of the notes were not set out in the claim. In that action, therefore, the merits of the claim were not passed upon by the court and the judgment is not a bar to their consideration here.

In the case of Palmer v. Guaranty Trust & Savings Bank, 45 Cal. App. 572, at page 577, 188 P. 302, 304, the court says: "On the contrary, if a party makes an improper attempt to present a claim to an administrator, particularly where it is so defective as to be insufficient to constitute the basis for a cause of action, he is not estopped from presenting one in due form, if within proper time, and upon which an action may be based. Westbay v. Gray, 116 Cal. 660, 48 P. 800; Warren v. McGill, 103 Cal. 153, 37 P. 144." See, also, 11 Cal. Jur. § 379, p. 661.

To the same effect: "To operate as a bar a judgment must have been final, upon the same claim or cause of action, between the same parties or their privities, and must have been an adjudication in the merits." 15 Cal. Jur. § 210, p. 171.

Thus where a plaintiff has pursued the wrong remedy or form of action a judgment against him is not on the merits of his claim. In Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 266, at page 272, it was held: "* * * If the trial went off on a technical defect, or because the cause of action had not yet accrued, or because of a temporary disability of the plaintiff to sue, or the like, the judgment will not be a bar to a future action. (Greenleaf on Evidence, Sec. 530.)" See, also, 15 Cal. Jur., § 183, p. 124.

In this matter we are therefore of the opinion that the notice to creditors published was insufficient and that the claim upon which the present action is based is not barred by the former judgment.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial under the law as determined hereby.

Civ. 8333.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 22, 1932.

1. Usury ⇐49.

Parties may freely contract in writing respecting interest within statutory limit of 12% per annum without right to compound interest (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

2. Usury ⇐53.

Lender may perform specific services or incur expenses entitling him to reimbursement from fund loaned, if incidental to loan and not mere device to exact additional interest or profit (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

3. Usury ⇐53.

Court will carefully scrutinize whole transaction and declare its substance, regardless of form, where lender performs services or incurs expenses entitling him to reimbursement from fund loaned (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

4. Usury ⇐15.

To constitute usury, interest exceeding 12% must have been paid under contract requiring payment thereof; but interest agreed on, not amount paid, determines usurious character of contract (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

5. Usury ⇐16.

Money paid for lender's cancellation of note or surrender of right should not be considered usurious, though resulting in rate exceeding 12%, if computed as part of interest (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

6. Usury ⇐77.

Contract originally unaffected by usury cannot be invalidated by subsequent usurious transaction (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

⇐For other cases see same topic and KEY NUMBER in all Key Number Digests and Indexes

*For subsequent opinion see 24 P.2d 501.

7. Usury ⇐111(4).

Complaint alleging defendant's agreement to loan plaintiff stated sum at 7% interest, which, with other alleged charges, totaled less than 12% of principal, did not state case of usury (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

The complaint alleged that defendant agreed to loan plaintiff $150,000, with interest at 7% per annum, without saying anything about compound interest, and that plaintiff was to pay brokerage fee of 3% of amount loaned, $250 inspection fee, $150 appraisal fee, and $25 to cover cost of drawing papers.

8. Usury ⇐111(4).

Court must assume, in absence of contrary allegation in complaint, that defendant finance company, loaning money to plaintiff, and mortgage company, charging brokerage fee, acted in different capacities, and that mortgage company had interest in loan and premium, in determining question of usury (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

9. Usury ⇐15.

Court must look entirely to parties' contract in determining whether transaction was usurious (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

10. Usury ⇐34.

Advancement of money loaned for improvements in installments on borrower's order, as improvements progressed, did not render transaction usurious (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

11. Usury ⇐113.

Burden is on borrower to show that transaction is usurious (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

12. Usury ⇐111(4).

Pleadings showing payment of less than 12% per annum on loan to plaintiff held demurrable as not pleading usury, notwithstanding conclusive allegations thereof (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

13. Usury ⇐111(4).

In pleading usury, it must be clearly alleged that sum charged as interest exceeds 12% per annum on amount of loan (Usury Law [St. 1919, p. lxxxiii]).

14. Usury ⇐111(4).

Allegation of complaint that defendant loan company acted as defendant finance company's agent in selling property under plaintiff's trust deed absolved loan company from liability to plaintiff for damages or money received.

15. Fraud ⇐43.

Complaint, alleging that president of defendant finance company fraudulently advised plaintiff not to sacrifice his equity in property sold under trust deed through purchase thereof for himself and one offering to advance money for such purpose or to pay off plaintiff's indebtedness to finance company, stated no cause of action for fraud.

16. Appeal and error ⇐909(5).

Appellate court must assume that plaintiff, appealing from adverse judgment in action for fraud in assuring him that property would be purchased by defendant for plaintiff's protection at sale under latter's trust deed, was in default at time, and that notice of breach and sale were given in conformity with deed, in absence of complete affirmative showing of terms of note and deed.

17. Mortgages ⇐369(3).

Sale under trust deed may be set aside, if bidders were kept away, undue advantage was taken to property owner's prejudice, he was lulled into false security, or sale was collusively or otherwise conducted for purchaser's benefit and property sold for greatly inadequate price.

18. Conspiracy ⇐1.

Conspiracy is not actionable, unless combination results in perpetration of unlawful act or of injurious act by unlawful means.

19. Mortgages ⇐591(3).

Ordinarily, sale under trust deed is absolute and redemption impossible without purchaser's acquiescence.

20. Corporations ⇐432(12).

President of corporation, assigning notes to another corporation for loan, had no power to make agreement to reconvey property to maker after sale thereof under deed securing notes, unless delegation of such authority to him was clearly shown.

21. Corporations ⇐506.

Corporation directors' demurrer to complaint, alleging corporation president's fraudulent statements tending to keep bidders from sale under trust deed, for misjoinder of parties, was properly sustained, in absence of allegations that they participated in or knew of such statements or any acts tending to prevent fair sale.

22. Pleading ⇐225(2).

Refusal of leave to amend third amended complaint on sustaining demurrers thereto held not abuse of discretion, where previous complaints were filed about ten months one year, and two years, respectively, after foreclosure sale sought to be set aside, and third amended complaint about seven months later.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by William L. Penziner against the West American Finance Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

B. M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for respondent West American Finance Co.

Orrick, Palmer & Dahlquist, of San Francisco (Christopher M. Jenks, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Pacific States Savings & Loan Co.

John A. Sinclair and A. Don Duncan, both of San Francisco, for respondents R. T. Harper, C. A. Gibson, J. E. Scully, and E. W. Milburn.

LAMBERSON, Justice pro tem.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the various defendants named in the action, based upon an order that the respective demurrers of the defendants to plaintiff's third amended complaint be sustained without leave to amend.

The original complaint was filed November 1, 1929, and was set out in a single count. By that complaint it was sought to have the sale of plaintiff's property set aside on the ground of fraud. One individual and one corporation, who do not now appear in the action, were included among the defendants. An amended complaint was filed as of right on December 28, 1929. A second amended complaint was filed on November 20, 1930, omitting the individual and corporate defendants above referred to, and adding the defendants J. E. Scully and E. W. Milburn.

The second amended complaint attempted to set forth three causes of action, and the relief sought was practically the same as that in the third amended complaint. The court sustained the demurrers of the defendants. The third amended complaint was filed June 9, 1931. The defendant West American Finance Company filed a demurrer in its own behalf; the defendants R. T. Harper, C. A. Gibson, J. E. Scully, and E. W. Milburn together filed a demurrer and a separate demurrer was filed by the defendant Pacific States Savings & Loan Company. On September 23, 1931, after a hearing of the demurrers, the court entered a minute order sustaining the demurrers without leave to amend, and on September 25, 1931, entered judgment in favor of the respondents.

In the first cause of action in the third amended complaint, the appellant alleged in substance that the defendants R. T. Harper, C. A. Gibson, J. E. Scully, and E. W. Milburn were at all of the times referred to in the complaint members of the board of directors of the defendant West American Finance Company, and that the defendant Harper was at all of said times the president thereof; that on the 15th day of August, 1927, plaintiff was the owner of a certain parcel of land situate on Jackson street near Buchanan in the city and county of San Francisco; that the respondent finance company was engaged in the business of making loans for the construction of buildings or other improvements, which loans were known as building or construction loans made for the purpose of providing owners of real property, who contemplated the construction thereon of improvements, with funds to pay for such construction, and that the plan regularly employed by said finance company, in making such loans, was to pay the same in installments from time to time to those supplying material and labor in the process of construction after such material and labor had actually been furnished and used in such construction, and to require those to whom such loans were made to agree to repay the principal upon maturity, and in the meantime to pay said finance company interest monthly in advance on the whole amount of the principal, whether or not any part of said loans had actually been paid out by said finance company, and regardless of the amount so actually paid out, and also regardless of the question of whether or not the interest so agreed to be paid and received by said finance company would prove to be the amount in excess of the rate of 12 per cent. per annum upon the aggregate amount of such installment computed upon the amounts of said several installments from the respective dates of the payment thereof; that at said time First Mortgage Bond Company, a corporation, was engaged in the business of canvassing the public in its own name, but in fact for and on behalf of said finance company for applications for such loans and of charging premiums to borrowers and collecting said premiums from such borrowers directly and through said finance company, and of dividing the same with said finance company, all of which was known to plaintiff and to all of the defendants; that on August 15, 1927, plaintiff desired to improve the real property described in the complaint by erecting an apartment house building thereon, and applied on said date to the defendant finance company for a construction loan of $150,000 to be secured by a deed of trust on the lot; that the finance company, through its president, requested plaintiff to procure from First Mortgage Bond Company a form of application, and to fill the same out and deliver it to the finance company, which occupied offices with the bond company; that plaintiff immediately procured such a form, which was directed to the bond company, but was in the form regularly used by the finance company in the ordinary course of its business, and plaintiff thereupon filled out the printed form, and delivered the same to the finance company, which thereupon approved it; that by its terms the plaintiff applied to the First Mortgage Bond Company for a construction loan in the sum stated for a term of one year, at 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance from date of the note, and set forth the character of the proposed building; that by the terms of said application it was provided that the amount of the loan was to be advanced on plaintiff's order in installments as the improvements progressed, and in amounts stipulated "by said First Mortgage Bond Company," and that the money borrowed was to be paid out for labor and material actually furnished and used in said improvements, directly to the contractors or materialmen and laborers, and that plaintiff was to pay a premium of 3 per cent. on the amount of said loan, and was to allow "said company" to write and maintain in effect fire insurance in the sum of $150,000; that a copy of the plans and specifications was delivered to the finance company as specified in the application; that on said date, and pursuant to the terms of said application, plaintiff, on August 16, 1927, executed a promissory note as specified in the application, and executed and delivered to the defendants R. T. Harper and C. A. Gibson, as trustees designated by the finance company, a deed of trust conveying the property described to said trustees as security for the payment of said promissory note, said deed of trust containing a power of sale whereby said trustees were authorized to sell said lots and improvements on demand of the finance company upon any default in the performance of the obligation set forth in the deed of trust; that in the usual and ordinary course of construction work, a period of one year was reasonably necessary for the construction of the improvements referred to, and that the rate of interest named in said promissory note would exceed a rate of 12 per cent. for one year if computed from the actual dates of the respective payments as made by the finance company; that the application form procured by plaintiff from the bond company was furnished by the bond company to plaintiff at the instance and request, and as the agent of the finance company, and for the purpose of enabling it to obtain from plaintiff for the use of said loan a greater rate than 12 per cent. for one year, all of which was known to plaintiff and all of the defendants other than the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, which will be referred to hereafter as the loan company; that at the time of making said application and of its approval by the finance company, and at the time of the execution and delivery of said promissory note and deed of trust, it was believed by plaintiff and the defendants, other than the loan company, that a greater rate of interest than 12 per cent. would be paid by plaintiff to the finance company, and received by the finance company by virtue of the provisions of said application and said promissory note, and it was the intent of the finance company to exact of plaintiff a greater sum for the use of the money advanced by it than interest at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum; that plaintiff immediately began the work of clearing and excavating said lot for construction purposes, and the finance company thereafter from time to time, until August 16, 1928, made advances of money pursuant to the agreement between it and plaintiff; that plaintiff is unable to state the actual amount of said advances so made, but is informed and believes that said advances did not, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of $100,000, and prior to the commencement of this action plaintiff demanded of the finance company an account of said advances, which said account the finance company delivered, but such account was not, in fact, a true account of said advances, but, on the contrary, was false and excessive, and no true account has ever been given to plaintiff; that about August 16, 1928, the defendants other than the loan company unlawfully combined and conspired together for the purpose of defrauding the plaintiff of his title to said property with the improvements; that pursuant to said conspiracy, the finance company on August 17, 1928, executed a purported notice of breach of the obligations of plaintiff under said deed of trust, and on August 21st caused said notice to be recorded, and said defendants Harper and Gibson, as trustees, did at the instance and in collusion with the finance company thereafter cause to be published a notice of sale of said real property, purporting to be under and by virtue of the power of sale, and fixed the date of sale as December 31, 1928; that pursuant to such conspiracy the finance company did, on December 15, 1928, unknown to plaintiff, make a purported assignment to the loan company of said promissory note for a consideration unknown to plaintiff, but with the understanding that the loan company would bid in said real property at the sale, and would obtain a deed therefor, and thereafter convey said real property to the finance company, and pursuant to said conspiracy said trustees on December 31, 1928, offered said property for sale, and the loan company bid therefor the sum of $150,000, which bid was accepted by the trustees who executed a deed of the real property to the loan company, and the trustees acknowledged the payment to them by the loan company of the sum of money in gold coin bid by it, and the loan company on March 13, 1929, conveyed said real property to the finance company pursuant to the understanding theretofore existing, and the finance company thereupon conveyed said property to one Joseph Greenback, who was one of the defendants named in the original and first amended complaint, for a consideration unknown to plaintiff, and without first giving to plaintiff an opportunity to redeem the property; that plaintiff had prior to December 31, 1928, received among other offers an offer from one Oliva to advance the money necessary to pay off his indebtedness to the finance company, or for the purchase of said real property for the joint account of plaintiff and of said purchaser, and that Oliva was ready, willing, and able to advance said money wherewith to pay off said indebtedness, or bid in said real property at said sale, and that plaintiff informed defendant Harper, who was at that time president of the finance company and one of the trustees named in said deed of trust, of said facts, but Harper, in pursuance to the conspiracy alleged, informed plaintiff that it would be unwise for plaintiff to sacrifice any of his equity in said property, and represented that it would not be necessary for him to carry out arrangements for a loan for the reason that the title would be bid in by the finance company, and would be held for the protection of plaintiff and reconveyed to him at any time after the sale upon his repaying the amount of his indebtedness to the finance company; that plaintiff was very young and inexperienced, and relied upon the statements of Harper, and for such reason refused offers of others to advance the money necessary to pay the finance company, and abandoned all attempts to raise the money necessary to pay off said indebtedness, or to bid in said property at the sale, and permitted the sale to take place without any bid being made on his behalf; that Harper also falsely represented to other persons who would otherwise have appeared and bid at said sale, that the property was to be bought in by the finance company for the benefit and protection of plaintiff, and but for said representations such other persons would have appeared at said sale and bid against said loan company for the property, but the only bid made at the sale was made by the loan company, and that but for the assurance and representations of Harper, other bidders would have been present and would have bid against said company for the purchase of the property, and that no other bidders were present at the sale; that after the announcement of the sale of the property to the loan company was made, Harper stated to plaintiff that the title was being taken in the name of the loan company, but for the account of the finance company, and that plaintiff need feel no uneasiness about the sale, and he would still be given the right to redeem the property at any time upon payment of the amount of his indebtedness; that daily, between the 2d and 11th days of January, 1929, plaintiff called upon Harper and offered to pay the full amount of his indebtedness to the finance company and redeem the property, but Harper rejected said offers and failed to state the amount of the indebtedness in response to the inquiries of plaintiff, and on January 11th finally informed plaintiff that it would not be possible to comply with his representations theretofore made, and that plaintiff would not be permitted to redeem the property; that thereupon plaintiff demanded an accounting, which accounting was refused; that the value of the property at the time of the sale was the sum of $450,000, and that plaintiff had suffered damages in the sum of $350,000.

The second cause of action set forth in the complaint again excepts the defendant Pacific States Savings & Loan Company; repeats the allegations as to the ownership of the property; the business in which the finance company was engaged; the application to the First Mortgage Bond Company; the execution of the note and deed of trust; the fact that the construction work would occupy a period of one year, and that the rate of interest would exceed 12 per cent. upon the installment payments computed from the actual dates when the payments were made; the intent and anticipation of the parties that such would be the fact, and that the advances did not, in the aggregate, exceed the sum of $100,000, and that the finance company did not deliver a true account of such advances to plaintiff. Then the second cause of action proceeds to allege in substance that about December 15, 1928, and after the recording of the notice of breach, the finance company borrowed from the defendant loan company the sum of $97,500, and by way of security, executed an assignment of plaintiff's note by way of pledge to the loan company with the understanding that the loan company would purchase the property of plaintiff at the trustees' sale for the account of the finance company, and would obtain a conveyance thereof from the trustees and hold the title thereto in lieu of said promissory note by way of security, and upon the repayment of the loan made to the finance company, reconvey said property to the finance company; that the exact contents of the instruments involved in said transaction are not known to plaintiff; that at the sale the loan company, under the direction of the finance company, bid for the property in its own name the sum of $150,000, which bid was accepted, and thereafter the trustees executed a deed conveying the property to the loan company; that the agreement above mentioned was that the loan company should hold legal title to the property subject to a lien thereon, in favor of the loan company for the sum of $97,500; that it was further agreed between the loan company, the finance company, and the trustees that the title to the property was taken by the loan company in lieu of and in substitution for plaintiff's promissory note so pledged to the loan company, and that the pledge was, by virtue of said conveyance, released and discharged; that at the time of the sale, the finance company had not actually paid out or advanced upon the construction of the buildings mentioned, sums exceeding the aggregate amount of $100,000, and that for the purpose of extorting from plaintiff a greater sum and value for the loan of the amount actually paid out, it charged to plaintiff as advances the sum of $10,500 for interest from August 16, 1927, to August 15, 1928, the sum of $4,500 as a so-called premium or brokerage fee for the making of the loan, the sum of $250 as a so-called inspection fee, the sum of $150 as a so-called appraisal fee, and the sum of $25 as a fee for drawing papers, amounting in all to the sum of $15,425, and that the finance company had also charged to plaintiff the sum of $3,937.50 for interest from August 16 to December 31, 1928, and that in addition thereto said finance company had charged plaintiff as advances from the principal a sum sufficient in amount to bring the total of said advances to the face amount of the principal of the promissory note, but that said advances were not, in fact, made pursuant to the application of the plaintiff, accepted by the finance company, and were fictitious; that all of said facts were known to the trustees, and to all the other defendants, and that the trustees, with the approval and consent of all the defendants, and under the instructions of the loan company and finance company, failed and neglected to collect the amount of said bid, or any part thereof, in cash from the loan company or said finance company, and in lieu thereof, receipted therefor to said loan company, and credited the amount, to wit, $150,000, upon said promissory note in payment of the amounts of the advances, and of the amounts charged by the finance company up to the sum of $19,362.50, and in pretended payment on account of said fictitious amounts charged to plaintiff upon the construction loan; that plaintiff does not know, and is unable to state the exact dates of the several payments made by the finance company, but alleges upon information and belief that the aggregate amount of interest from the respective dates thereof to the 31st of December, 1928, did not exceed certain amounts much less than the amount charged; that the value of the property at the time of the sale was the sum of $350,000, and that through the medium of said sale and the said conveyance to said loan company for the account of said finance company, said plaintiff was compelled to and did pay, and said finance company did extort and receive from him and appropriate to itself for said loan, which did not exceed the sum of $100,000, the said sum and value of $19,362.50, which is a greater sum than would accrue at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum; that no part of the sum of $19,362.50, or of the proceeds of the sale, has been paid to plaintiff.

As a third and separate cause of action against defendants Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, R. T. Harper, and C. A. Gibson, the complaint alleged in substance that the respondent West American Finance Company was engaged in the business of making construction loans, and that the method or plan regularly employed was to require interest, monthly in advance on the principal amount named in the loan, whether or not any part of said loan had actually been paid out by the finance company, and regardless of the question of whether or not the interest agreed to be paid to and received by said finance company would be in excess of 12 per cent. per annum, computed from the respective dates of payments of installments; and that First Mortgage Bond Company was engaged in the business of canvassing for loans in behalf of the finance company. The complaint then alleges the ownership of the property previously described; plaintiff's desire to improve the lot by the erection of an apartment house; his application made through the First Mortgage Bond Company to the finance company for a loan dated August 15, 1927; the execution of his promissory note and deed of trust, and several other allegations which are but repetitions of allegations contained in the first cause of action, including the notice of breach, and the notice of sale to be held on December 31, 1928; the assignment of the note to the loan company; the holding of the sale at the time indicated in the notice at which sale the loan company bid for the property the sum of $150,000, and received a deed therefor; that the finance company had not actually paid out or advanced installments exceeding an aggregate amount of $100,000, and that for the purpose of extorting a greater rate of interest than 12 per cent. per annum, the said finance company had falsely charged plaintiff with certain advances already detailed; that plaintiff does not know, and is unable to state, the exact dates of the several payments made by the finance company on account of the loan; that no notice was ever given to the plaintiff of the purchase by the loan company of said note, and that plaintiff was ignorant thereof until after the sale of the property on December 31, 1928; that all of the facts therein above set forth in said third cause of action were known to the defendants Harper and Gibson and the loan company at the time of the assignment of said note by the finance company; that the defendants Harper and Gibson, as trustees, at the instance of the loan company, failed and neglected to collect the amount of the bid, and in lieu thereof receipted for the same to the loan company, and credited the amount thereof, to wit, the sum of $150,000 upon said promissory note in payment of advances actually made as alleged, and of the amounts charged by said finance company for the loan of said sum amounting to the sum of $15,425 and of the additional sum of $3,- 937.50 for interest from August 16 to December 31, 1928, and in pretended payment of account of fictitious amounts charged by the finance company; that the value of the property was $350,000 at the time of the sale, and through the medium of said sale and conveyance, the plaintiff was compelled to pay said loan company, and the loan company did charge to and receive from him, and appropriate to itself for the loan of said installments of money, which did not exceed the sum of $100,000, a sum which represented a rate of interest greater than 12 per cent. per annum, and that none of said sum has been repaid to plaintiff.

As a fourth and separate cause of action against the defendants Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, R. T. Harper, and C. A. Gibson, the plaintiff reaffirmed in greater part his allegations of the third cause of action, and added these allegations: That the loan company knew that the principal of the promissory note purchased by it was payable one year from the 16th of August, 1927, and also knew that said note was given to secure advances upon a loan as thereinbefore set forth, and that the loan company failed and neglected to notify plaintiff of its purpose to purchase said promissory note, and failed and neglected to make inquiries of plaintiff as to the amount of advances actually made upon said construction loan and covered by said note, or as to any other facts tending to show the rights and obligations of plaintiff in connection therewith, and upon information and belief, plaintiff alleged that the loan company failed and neglected to examine the records of the finance company, or to take any other steps open to it to ascertain the actual amounts advanced by the finance company upon the loan, or to make any inquiries in relation to any facts tending to show the rights and liabilities of the plaintiff, and that all the facts thereinbefore set forth were at all times known to the defendants Harper and Gibson, and that the said loan company could have ascertained all of said facts, but for its failure and neglect to make such inquiries.

Plaintiff prays judgment against all of the defendants other than the Pacific States Savings & Loan Company, for damages in the sum of $350,000, and with the alternative prayer that if for any reason it should be determined that plaintiff is not entitled to said damages, then that defendants be compelled to account to plaintiff for all moneys received out of said property, and that plaintiff have judgment against said defendants and each of them for the amount so found to have been received, less the sum of $100,000 advanced by said finance company, and that plaintiff have judgment against all of the defendants and each of them for $58,087.60, being treble the amount of the sum which said defendants or any or either of them may be found to have taken or received for the loan of said sum of $100,000, and for all other further and additional relief to which he might be entitled.

The first count, briefly, is an action for damages occasioned the plaintiff by fraud practiced by defendants, other than the loan company, in assuring plaintiff that the property to be sold under the deed of trust would be bought in by the finance company for his protection, and thereby dissuading him from looking up bidders for the property to be sold under the deed of trust, and in dissuading other bidders from attending the sale. Appellant claims that the element of usury is necessarily involved in this count because the measure of damages is the value of the property, less the amount of principal and interest owing under the deed of trust, and any usurious interest must be left out of the question because the agreement to pay the same is void.

The second count is against the same defendants named in the first count, for an accounting, and for treble the amount of usurious interest received by the finance company, of which corporation the individual defendants were directors, and the defendant Harper was president.

The third count purports to allege a claim of usury against the loan company and the defendants Harper and Gibson upon the theory that the usurious interest had been received by the loan company through the cooperation of the defendants Harper and Gibson, and that all of the facts were known to each of said defendants.

The fourth count appears to set forth a claim to liability on the part of the defendants loan company, Harper, and Gibson, by reason of the fact that the loan company failed and neglected to notify plaintiff of its purpose to buy in the property, and failed to make inquiry of the plaintiff as to the state of the transaction with the finance company, and that such facts were at all times known to Harper and Gibson.

Appellant in his opening brief states that all of the counts in the complaint involve usury. The demurrers of the various defendants are voluminous, and for that reason we have already devoted considerable space to a statement, in substance, of the allegations contained in the different causes of action set forth in the third amended complaint. The demurrers are both general and special, that of the defendant finance company alleging that the complaint, as well as each separate count thereof, fails to state a cause of action; that there is a misjoinder of the parties and of causes of action; and that there are many uncertainties and ambiguities and unintelligible allegations contained in the two counts against the finance company.

The demurrer of the loan company is to each cause of action, and particularly to the third and fourth, both upon general and special grounds. The demurrer of the individual defendants is based upon general and special grounds. Inasmuch as the claim of usury forms the basis of the second, third, and fourth causes of action and plays an important part in determining the liabilities of the defendants who were made parties to the first cause of action, it is advisable to discuss that question at this time.

[1-3] Section 3 of the Usury Law (St. 1919, p. lxxxiii) provides: "Every person, company, association or corporation, who for any loan or forbearance of money, goods or things in action shall have paid or delivered any greater sum or value than is allowed to be received under the preceding sections, one and two, may either in person or his or its personal representative, recover in an action at law against the person, company, association or corporation who shall have taken or received the same, or his or its personal representative, treble the amount of the money so paid or value delivered in violation of said sections, providing such action shall be brought within one year after such payment or delivery."

Under this law, the maximum rate of 12 per cent. per annum on the amount loaned is the full measure of all profit to the lender without the right to compound interest, and within such limits the parties may, in writing, freely contract in respect thereto. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., 200 Cal. 609, 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 53 A. L. R. 725. The lender may also perform services or incur expenses in connection with the loan, which will entitle him to reimbursement from the fund about to be loaned, but such items must be confined to specific services or expenses incidental to the loan and incurred in such a way as to absolutely preclude its being merely a device through which additional interest or profit on the loan may be exacted, and a court will carefully scrutinize the whole transaction and declare its substance regardless of its form. Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Co., supra.

[4, 5] To constitute a violation of the usury statutes, two elements must concur: First, interest in excess of 12 per cent. must actually have been paid; second, such interest must have been paid pursuant to a contract, the terms of which required the payment of interest by the borrower in excess of 12 per cent. per annum. It is, however, the interest charge agreed to be paid under the terms of the contract, and not the amount of interest which was actually paid which determines the usurious character of the contract. Westman v. Dye (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 134. Money paid in consideration of the cancellation of a note or for the surrender of some right on the part of the lender and resulting in a rate of interest in excess of 12 per cent. if computed as a part of the interest, should not be considered as involving a matter of interest, or as being usurious. McCarty v. Mellinkoff (Cal. App.) 4 P.(2d) 595.

[6] A contract which, in its inception, is unaffected by usury, can never be invalidated by any subsequent usurious transaction. O. A. Graybeal Co. v. Cook, 111 Cal. App. 518, 295 P. 1088; Sharp v. Mortgage Security Corporation of America (Cal. Sup.) 9 P.(2d) 819.

[7] In the instant case the application for the loan and the note and deed of trust have not been made a part of the third amended complaint, but according to the allegations of the complaint respondent finance company agreed to loan to appellant $150,000 with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, payable monthly in advance. Nothing is said in the complaint about the compounding of interest. In addition to the payment of said principal sum and interest, appellant was to pay a brokerage fee of 3 per cent. of the amount of the loan to the First Bond Mortgage Company; the sum of $250 for an inspection fee; $150 as an appraisal fee; and $25 to cover the cost of drawing papers. Granting to the allegations of the complaint all of the weight and meaning that may be attached thereto, and construing them most favorably to appellant, they do not state a case of usury because the total amount of the charges is much less than the sum which would accrue upon the principal named in the promissory note at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum.

[8] There is no showing in the complaint that the entire amount of the brokerage fee, or any particular or substantial part thereof, was to be paid to the defendant finance company. The complaint simply alleges that the First Bond Mortgage Company occupied offices jointly with the finance company; that the mortgage company was engaged in the business of canvassing the public in its own name, but for and on behalf of the finance company, for loans; of charging premiums to borrowers and of dividing the premiums with the finance company; that appellant applied to the finance company for a loan upon a form directed to the bond company; and that by the terms of the application, the amount of the loan was to be advanced on plaintiff's order in installments as the improvements progressed, and in amounts stipulated by the bond company. The complaint does not indicate that the premium or brokerage charge, or the appraisal or inspection fees or the fees for drawing papers, were not actually paid by the finance company, or that they were not actually paid out to other persons or corporations for services rendered under the application agreement. In the absence of allegations to the contrary, we must assume that the finance company and the

First Bond Mortgage Company were acting in different capacities, and that the First Bond Mortgage Company had an interest in the application which was made by the appellant, and in the premium paid therefor.

[9, 10] The court, in determining whether or not the transaction was usurious, must look entirely to the contract into which the parties entered. In the light of the agreement as set forth in the complaint, and in the absence of the text of the application, the promissory note and the deed of trust, or of any other papers which might have entered into the transaction and which have not been made a part of the complaint, nothing appears, and no mathematical calculation can be made, which would indicate that the transaction was intended by the parties to involve usury. The intent of the parties is not here involved, because the complaint does not set forth a state of facts which in any wise discloses a condition of usury. In Haines v. Commercial Mortgage Company, supra, the court said (page 625 of 200 Cal., 254 P. 956, 255 P. 805, 807, 53 A. L. R. 725): "We intended to hold that the maximum rate allowed for loans coming under the act is at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum for the full period of the loan, and that within such limit the parties may freely contract in respect thereto, if done in writing. * * * This means, also, that commissions and bonuses may be charged by the lender, but all such charges must, when added to the interest specified and spread over the whole period of forbearance, be kept within the limit set by the law." The fact that money was advanced from time to time in installments will not render the transaction usurious if the contract was not subject to the charge of usury in its inception. As we have seen the moneys advanced were to be paid on plaintiff's order as the improvements progressed. No delay in the payment of advances occasioned by his voluntary act could render the agreement usurious. Low v. Sutherlin, Barry & Co. (C. C. A.) 35 F. (2d) 443; Sharp v. Mortgage Security Corporation of America, supra.

[11-13] The burden is upon the borrower to show that a transaction is usurious. If the pleadings, notwithstanding conclusive allegations, evidence the payment of an amount not in excess of 12 per cent. per annum, a demurrer addressed to the deficiency in pleading should be sustained. In pleading usury, it is necessary to clearly set out that the sum is in excess of 12 per cent. Mortgage Guarantee Co. v. Patch, 116 Cal. App. 584, 3 P. (2d) 35. In the case of Coley v. Wolcott, 103 Cal. App. 140, 146, 284 P. 241, 244, the court said: "While courts will tolerate no subterfuges designed to evade the Usury Law, and will always admit evidence to show that a contract fair on its face is nevertheless a disguise for a usurious transaction, it is equally true that, if a contract is subject to two constructions, one of which will render it usurious and therefore unlawful and one which will render it lawful, the courts, in the absence of other evidence requiring the contract to be construed as usurious, will give it such a construction as will render it lawful. Shelley v. Byers, 73 Cal. App. 44, 57, 238 P. 177; Cobb v. Hartenstein, 47 Utah, 174, 152 P. 424, 427; Ohio Inv. Co. v. Brown, 89 Kan. 66, 130 P. 665; Lusk v. Smith, 71 Kan. 550, 81 P. 173; German Sav., Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Leavens, 89 Wash. 78, 153 P. 1092; Martin v. Oklahoma State Bank, 86 Okl. 113, 206 P. 824; Foreman v. Needles, 78 Okl. 105, 188 P. 1087."

The complaint in the case before us omits material matters in regard to the actual dates and amounts of advances which must have been within the knowledge of the appellant, because the payments were to be made upon his order. In Whittemore v. Davis, 112 Cal. App. 702, 708, 297 P. 640, 642, the court said: "A pleading must be construed most strongly against the pleader (Du Bois v. Padgham, 18 Cal. App. 301, 123 P. 207) and, so construed, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. If the allegations in a pleading are silent as to dates, and it appears that such dates are material to the issue, it must be presumed that a statement of such dates would have weakened the pleader's case. The same rule applies when the pleader fails to make a clear specific statement of the facts relied upon. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 100, 27 P. 29."

[14] There is nothing in the amended complaint to show that the transaction whereby the finance company assigned the promissory note of appellant to the loan company as security for a loan of $97,500 was anything but a legitimate transfer. The allegation of the complaint that the loan company was at all times acting as the agent of the finance company in the matter of the sale of the property absolves the loan company from individual liability. There was no contractual relation between appellant and the loan company, and so far as the allegations of the complaint are concerned, it does not appear that the loan company retained for its use any of the proceeds of the sale in excess of the sums owing to it from the finance company. We are of the opinion that the several demurrers to the second, third and fourth causes of action were properly sustained, for the reason that none of the said causes of action constitute a cause of action against respondents or either of them. It is unnecessary to discuss the other and numerous phases of the demurrers filed on behalf of the various respondents to these causes of action.

The appellant in his argument states that the first cause of action is based upon the theory that the sale whereby the loan company obtained the property which was sold by the trustees under the notice before referred to, was illegal, and that appellant is entitled to damages measured by the value of his equity; that is, by the value of the property after deducting therefrom the sum of $100,000 advanced under the provisions of the promissory note and deed of trust. He expresses it again as an action for damages for the wrong of respondents in defrauding appellant of his property by means of a sale thereof at which he and others were dissuaded from bidding; that the gist of the action is the stifling of bids.

In view of what we have already said, it is unnecessary to discuss the charge of usury, to the development of which a large part of the first cause of action is devoted, it being the theory of appellant that the matter of usury is important in fixing the amount of damages to which appellant might be entitled, because if the loan were usurious, there should be no deduction for interest in computing the sum which should be allowed in mitigation of damage; that is, the principal sum named in the promissory note. The allegations of the first cause of action have already been detailed. The charges of fraud and conspiracy begin with allegations that about August 16th, the defendants, other than the loan company, unlawfully combined and conspired for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff of his title to the real property described, and pursuant thereto executed a notice of breach followed by a notice of sale, fixing December 31, 1928, as the date of the sale. In the meantime, on December 15th, the note was assigned to the loan company. Up to and including such assignment, everything that the finance company did was something that it had a lawful right to do, and nothing that intervened between the execution of the note and deed of trust by appellant, and the giving of the notice of sale by the trustees, is entitled to consideration because the charge of conspiracy and fraud must be sustained by what ultimately occurred, and not by such intervening acts as were lawfully done by respondents. The charge of usury has no connection with the alleged acts of fraud or conspiracy, which acts began with the notice of breach according to the allegations of the complaint. The loan company, according to the complaint, did not share in the conspiracy, and all of its acts were done in the enforcement of its legal rights as an assignee of the promissory note.

[15] The allegations in regard to other possible bidders are that appellant received an offer from one Oliva, among others, to advance the money necessary to pay off his indebtedness to said finance company, or for the purchase of the real property at said sale for the joint account of plaintiff and of said purchaser, and that said Oliva was ready, willing, and able to advance said money wherewith to pay off said indebtedness, or bid in said real property at said sale; that appellant informed the respondent Harper of said facts, and that Harper, in pursuance of the conspiracy, informed appellant verbally that it would be unwise for him to sacrifice any of his equity in said real property, and represented to him that it would not be necessary for him to carry out said arrangements for the reason that the title would be bid in for the finance company, and would be held for his protection and reconveyed to him at any time after the sale upon his repaying the amount of his indebtedness; and the complaint again alleged that in further pursuance of said conspiracy said Harper falsely represented to other persons who would otherwise have appeared and bid at said sale, that the property was to be bought in for the finance company for the benefit and protection of plaintiff, and that but for said representations, such other persons would have appeared at said sale and bid against said loan company, and that the only bid made at the sale was made by the loan company, and but for the assurances and representations on the part of Harper, other bidders would have been present and would have bid against said company, and that no other bidders were present.

The allegations that Harper advised appellant that it would be unnecessary to sacrifice his equity is inconsistent with the allegation that Oliva was ready to advance money to pay off the indebedness by which action appellant would have protected his title to the property, both legal and equitable. The allegation is ambiguous and uncertain because the failure of appellant to take advantage of an opportunity to secure a complete liquidation of his indebtedness before the sale constituted a lack of diligence on his part for which the defendants could not have been responsible. Appellant's remedy under such circumstances, the funds being available, was to have secured the advance from Oliva, and to have paid the indebtedness. Gavin v. Phillips, 12 Cal. App. 34, 106 P. 424. In spite of his youth and inexperience, there is nothing to indicate that the appellant was ignorant of the conditions of the application, or of the promissory note or deed of trust. The allegations that Harper falsely made representations to other persons, who would otherwise have appeared and bid, contain no statements as to the names of such persons, or possible bidders, or the amounts which they would have been able and willing to bid, or a statement that they would have been able to bid a sum in excess of $150,000, and nowhere is there a showing that Harper dissuaded or discouraged any of said bidders, or Oliva, who was the only person named in the complaint as a possible bidder, or by his insistence compelled any of them to remain away from the sale, or from bidding at the sale.

[16, 17] The weakness of appellant's first cause of action lies in the fact that appellant did not allege, and does not contend, that the loan company was a party to the conspiracy, or did any act tending to defraud the appellant. It was the legal holder of the obligation, and had the lawful right to be a bidder at the sale. There is no allegation in the first count of any act of collusion with the finance company or the trustees, on the part of the loan company, designed to defraud the appellant, and the complaint is silent as to any intimation that the loan company had any part in dissuading other bidders to remain away from the sale. It received by the sale what it had a right to acquire, and it must be assumed in the light of the complaint that it received a valuable consideration from the finance company for the reconveyance of the property to that corporation in the form of a settlement of the indebtedness of the latter to it, the existence of which indebtedness is not questioned. In the absence of an affirmative and complete showing of the terms of the promissory note and deed of trust, we must assume that the appellant was in default on August 16, 1928, and that the notice of breach and notice of sale were regularly given in conformity with the terms of the deed of trust. All of the acts of conspiracy, therefore, center about the sale held on December 31, 1928, and the alleged stifling of bids and the matter then resolves itself into a determination of the question as to whether the acts of Harper as president of the finance company, or of the trustees, were such as to keep bidders from being present, at the sale and competing in the bidding for the property. The general rule governing this class of cases is expressed in Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 P. 194, 196, where the court, quoting from Schroeder v. Young, 161 U. S. 334, 16 S. Ct. 512, 40 L. Ed. 721, said: " 'If the sale has been attended by any irregularity, as if several lots had been * * * sold in such manner that their full value could not be realized; if bidders have been kept away; if any undue advantage has been taken to the prejudice of the owner of the property, or he has been lulled into a false security; or if the sale has been collusively or in any other manner conducted for the benefit of the purchaser, and the property has been sold at a greatly inadequate price, the sale may be set aside, and the owner may be permitted to redeem.' (The italics are ours.) We think there can be no doubt under the authorities that where, in addition to gross inadequacy of price, the purchaser has, in the language of the United States Supreme Court, 'been guilty of any unfairness or has taken any undue advantage,' resulting in such gross inadequacy and consequent injury to the owner of the property, he will be deemed guilty of fraud warranting the interposition of a court of equity in favor of the owner who is himself without fault." Winbigler v. Sherman, 175 Cal. 270, 165 P. 943; Sargent v. Shumaker, 193 Cal. 122, 223 P. 464.

In Jones v. Sierra Verdugo Water Co., 63 Cal. App. 254, 263, 218 P. 454, 457, the court said: "The established rule in this state is that: 'Mere inadequacy of price, however gross, is not itself a sufficient ground for setting aside a sale legally made. There must, in addition, be proof of some element of fraud, unfairness, or oppression, before a court will be justified in depriving the purchaser of his legal advantage.' Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 280, 281, 165 P. 948. See, also, Bock v. Losekamp, 179 Cal. 676, 677, 179 P. 516. Appellants claim that they are entitled to have the sale set aside under this statement of the rule. They claim that the facts alleged by them in their complaint do show that, in addition to inadequacy of price, there was fraud and unfairness. But the accompanying fraud, unfairness, or oppression which will suffice to make inadequacy of price a ground for setting aside a sale must be such as accounts for and brings about the inadequacy of price. The rule is stated in Ruling Case Law as follows: 'What causes, in addition to inadequacy of price, are sufficient to lead the court to withhold confirmation from a sale at a sacrifice, cannot well be reduced to any general rule; but they must be such as were calculated to prevent the property from bringing its value, or something reasonably near what it should bring at a public sale, and which on the particular occasion have actually produced that effect.' 16 R. C. L. p. 98."

[18-20] Conspiracy is not actionable, unless the combination results in the perpetration of an unlawful act or of some injurious act by unawful means. Moropoulos v. C. H. & O. B. Fuller Co., 186 Cal. 679, 200 P. 601.

Weighed by these tests, do the allegations of the complaint disclose a course of conduct so tainted with deceit as to render the sale fraudulent and actionable as to the appellant? It is not alleged that any bidders were actually dissuaded from attending the sale or from bidding thereat, by the active persuasion of the president of the finance company or the trustees named in the deed of trust. Appellant knew of the notices, and of the time and place of sale, and of the right, as well as the duty, of the trustees, to sell, and knew that the obligation had matured. It must be assumed that appellant knew that ordinarily, under the terms of a deed of trust, the sale is absolute and no redemption is possible except by the acquiescence of the purchaser. The property upon conveyance to the loan company was no longer property over which the trustees had any control, and the conveyance to the finance company was likewise absolute. It was beyond the power of the president to make any agreement as to permitting a reconveyance to the appellant in the absence of a clear showing that such authority had been delegated to him, and the alleged promise to reconvey was without consideration. Williams v. Parker, 30 Cal. App. 71, 157 P. 550; Peachy v. Witter, 131 Cal. 316, 63 P. 468; Downing v. Brennan, 232 Mass. 535, 122 N. E. 729. We must conclude that the acts of the finance company and of the respondent Harper, as set forth in the complaint, were not such as were calculated to prevent the property from bringing its value, or something reasonably near what it should bring at a public sale, and that the acts of respondents did not actually produce that effect. A discussion of all the various demurrers, particularly upon the ground of ambiguity and uncertainty, would entail the use of space which we consider unnecessary in view of our conclusions as to the principles which underlie the nature of the right of appellant, as attempted to be set forth in the third amended complaint.

[21] The third amended complaint does not make out a case against the defendants Milburn, Scully, or Gibson, because it does not appear in any way that those defendants, either officially or otherwise, actually participated in or had knowledge of any of the alleged statements of Harper, which tended to keep bidders away from the sale, or of any acts which tended to prevent a fair sale being had, and it does not appear that the respondents Scully or Milburn, even though they were directors of the company, joined in any act or were parties to any acts whereby a fair sale was prevented. Their demurrer as to misjoinder of parties was properly sustained.

[22] Appellant has objected that the court abused its discretion in sustaining the various demurrers to the third amended complaint without leave to amend. As has already appeared, judgment was entered upon the order in favor of respondents two days after the order was entered. The original complaint to set aside the sale was filed about ten months after the sale occurred. The second complaint was filed about a year after the sale, the second amended complaint about two years after the sale, and the third amended complaint about seven months later. We must conclude that during the passing of such a period of time, the appellant was able to inform himself as to his rights and to formulate a complaint in accordance with a definite theory. As we have hereinbefore observed, the original and first amended complaints had as their basis a cause of action distinctly different from the cause of action attempted to be set forth in the second and third amended complaints. Inclined as the courts are to a hearing of an issue upon its merits, still there must be an end to litigation, and while the time elapsed between entry of the minute order sustaining the demurrers to the last complaint, and the entry of the judgment was very short, in the absence of an affirmative showing that the appellant made application for leave to amend, or expressed a desire to amend, and in view of all of the circumstances which we have recited, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing leave to amend. Haddad v. McDowell (Cal. Sup.) 3 P.(2d) 550, and cases therein cited.

The judgment is affirmed.

126 Cal.App. 550

CITIZENS' NAT. TRUST & SAVINGS BANK OF LOS ANGELES v. ARROWHEAD SPRINGS BEVERAGE CO.

Civ. 8646.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Sept. 30, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 28, 1932.

1. Corporations ⇐76.

Document acknowledging receipt of check for stated sum on account of stock subscription held mere "receipt," not "contract."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Contract" and "Receipt," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Corporations ⇐77.

Document reciting receipt of stock and recipient's agreement to deliver other stock therefor or return that received was both "receipt" and "contract," to be construed with prior stock subscription agreement (Civ. Code, § 1642).

3. Evidence ⇐416.

Parol evidence was admissible to show that words "and seven hundred shares of Common," after signature to receipt for check on account of subscription for preferred stock, were intended as part of receipt.

4. Corporations ⇐77.

Corporation agent's receipt for check on account of stock subscription "on the terms set forth in * * * subscription contract" held not vulnerable to objection that, such contract being complete, its terms cannot be enlarged by construing other writings therewith (Civ. Code, § 1642).

5. Corporations ⇐77.

Instruments modifying prior stock subscription agreement by obligating corporation to sell common as well as preferred stock may be considered in ascertaining terms of real contract (Civ. Code, § 1642).

6. Evidence ⇨66.

It must be taken that stock subscriber, to whom court found, and subscription agreement stated, that sale permit, showing issuance of common stock in escrow to corporation's president and promoter, who could sell it only on further permission of corporation commissioner, was exhibited, knew that promoter owned such stock.

7. Corporations ⇨79.

It was corporation agent's duty to inform stock subscriber that sale of common stock was by corporation's president and promoter, who owned it, and agent's negligence in that regard was chargeable to corporation.

8. Corporations ⇨77.

Letters acknowledging subscription for preferred stock and informing subscriber that corporation president owned common stock and would apply to corporation commissioner for permission to transfer it cannot be considered with subscription agreement and contemporaneous documents in determining real agreement; contract having already been consummated (Civ. Code, § 1642).

9. Corporations ⇨77.

Letters from corporation by its president and from latter personally to stock subscriber cannot be considered as evidence of parties' construction of subscription contract; one being written by outsider and the other by only one party to contract.

10. Evidence ⇨271(19).

Letters acknowledging preferred stock subscription and informing subscriber that corporation president owned common stock and would apply to corporation commissioner for permission to transfer it were self-serving declarations, which could not be considered in interpreting contract.

11. Novation ⇨1.

To accomplish novation, new debtor must be substituted with creditor's consent, and parties must intend to release original debtor's obligation.

12. Novation ⇨12.

Letters acknowledging preferred stock subscription and informing subscriber that corporation president owned common stock and would apply to corporation commissioner for permission to transfer it held not to evidence president's substitution for corporation as debtor for common stock, in absence of evidence that subscriber consented or so intended.

13. Stipulations ⇨14(7).

Stipulation that stock subscriber would testify that she would not have signed agreement had she known she was not to receive common stock supported finding that sale thereof was material consideration for contract.

14. Corporations ⇨78.

Stock subscriber, notifying corporation of rescission of contract over eight months after date thereof, held not guilty of laches barring recovery of amount paid, where she made numerous futile attempts in meantime to obtain common stock, sale of which was material consideration for contract, and attended annual stockholders' meeting.

15. Licenses ⇨39.

Stock subscriber held entitled to recover amount paid as against contention that both parties were equally guilty in contracting for sale of common stock without permission of corporation commissioner.

16. Appeal and error ⇨1058(1).

Exclusion of corporation agent's testimony that he told stock subscriber that corporation president owned common stock held not prejudicial error, where sale permit, exhibited to subscriber, stated such fact.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Douglas L. Edmonds, Judge.

Action by Annie W. Stimson against the Arrowhead Springs Beverage Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals, the Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank of Los Angeles, as guardian of plaintiff's estate, being substituted for appellant after she was declared incompetent.

Affirmed.

Rollin L. McNitt, Bertin A. Weyl, and Edythe Jacobs, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Janeway, Beach & Hankey and S. T. Hankey, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

Annie W. Stimson having been declared incompetent, pending this appeal, the guardian of her estate has been substituted in her stead. For the sake of clarity, she will continue to be called the respondent.

Respondent recovered judgment for the return of her paid subscription for appellant's stock upon the theory that the subscription agreement was void because it included the sale of 700 shares of common stock, which, under the permit of the corporation commissioner, was not to be sold but was to be issued in escrow for the promoter of appellant, as well as 3,040 shares of preferred stock, which such permit authorized appellant to sell. Appellant disputes the evidence's support of the finding that the sale included such common stock in addition to such preferred stock. Respondent signed a subscription agreement in the following form: "I hereby subscribe for and agree to purchase 3040 shares of * * * Preferred stock of" appellant "and agree to pay therefor $10.00 per share * * * in cash with this subscription. * * *" At the same time, appellant's agent signed and delivered a writing, prepared by himself and reading as follows: "Received of Annie W. Stimson * * * check for the sum of Thirty Thousand Four Hundred Dollars on account of his (sic) subscription for 3040 shares of * * * Preferred shares of said Company on the terms set forth in his (sic) subscription contract. * * *" Underneath his signature, the agent wrote, "and seven hundred shares of Common." Also, at the same time, the agent signed and delivered the following instrument, prepared by respondent's secretary: "Received of Annie W. Stimson * * * 152 shares of * * * the Anaheim Sugar Co. * * * for which I agree to deliver to her 3040 shares of the preferred stock and 700 shares of the common stock of the" appellant "or I agree to return the sugar stock received." It is undisputed that the agent received the sugar stock and not the check, and that he sold this stock for cash several days later as previously arranged by the parties. No question arises as to the agent's authority.

[1-3] In support of the finding, respondent, invoking the rule of construction declared in section 1642 of the Civil Code, that "several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together," contends that the true agreement is not evidenced solely by the agreement signed by respondent, but its terms are to be ascertained by consideration of all three documents. Torrey v. Shea, 29 Cal. App. 313, 155 P. 820. In reply, appellant argues that, since the last two documents are receipts and not contracts, the above rule is not applicable, and that therefore the agreement is evidenced solely by the first writing. Since the second document is but a bare acknowledgment that the agent received a check, it is a mere receipt. Greer v. Los Angeles Athletic Club, 84 Cal. App. 272, 276, 258 P. 155. The third document is both a receipt and a contract because, in addition to acknowledging receipt of the stock, the agent agrees to deliver specified stock therefor or to return the stock so received. Lawrence v. Premier Indem. Assur. Co., 180 Cal. 688, 182 P. 431. Although the Code in stating the rule uses the word "contract," generally the rule as stated uses the word "instrument" in lieu thereof. 13 C. J. 528; 6 R. C. L. 850. In Flinn & Treacy v. Mowry, 131 Cal. 481, 63 P. 724, 1006, in construing a receipt and contract together, it was assumed that a receipt was within the terms of the Code section. In that the last two instruments are identical for present purposes, the same result is obtained, even if the first of these is ignored. Appellant's further objection that the words after the signature in the second writing formed no part thereof is untenable, because parol evidence was admissible to show such addition was intended to form part of the receipt. Verzan v. McGregor, 23 Cal. 339.

[4, 5] Citing Merkeley v. Fisk, 179 Cal. 748, 754, 178 P. 945, 948, to the effect that several contracts can be construed together "only when upon their face they deal with the same subject-matter and are by reference to one another so connected that they may be fairly said to be interdependent," appellant argues that, as the first agreement signed by respondent is complete, its terms cannot be enlarged by construing therewith the two other writings. But the first receipt signed by the agent does refer to the contract signed by respondent, and therefore it is not vulnerable to this objection. The cited case, following Torrey v. Shea, supra, also recognizes that this rule yields to the rule that "a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates," and that, therefore, oral testimony of the surrounding circumstances is admissible for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties concerning the scope and effect of the several instruments. The fact that the last two instruments by increasing appellant's obligation to that extent modify the agreement signed by respondent does not prohibit their consideration in ascertaining the terms of the real contract. Cobb v. Doggett, 142 Cal. 142, 75 P. 785; McAuliff v. McFadden, 42 Cal. App. 505, 183 P. 870; Spotton v. Dyer, 42 Cal. App. 585, 184 P. 23; Kelly v. Great Western Acc. Ins. Co., 46 Cal. App. 747, 189 P. 785.

[6, 7] The testimony of respondent and the agent disclosed that, when several days before the execution of the documents, he solicited her subscription for preferred stock, she demanded common stock, as an incentive therefor; that he told her, according to his version, that Charles G. Anthony, the president and promotor of appellant, owned it, and, according to her version, that the common stock was owned by the promoters; that he would have to obtain Anthony's approval before he could give her such common stock; and that several days after he returned and the documents were executed. The reverse of the subscription agreement fully set forth the permit, from which it clearly appears that all common stock was issued in escrow to Anthony, who could only sell it upon further permission of the corporation commissioner. In view of the finding that such permit was exhibited to her and the statement in the subscription agreement that such permit was so exhibited and that she had read the same, it must be taken as true that she knew that Anthony owned the common stock. Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322. However, she had already been told that either, according to her version, that the promoters owned such stock, or, according to the agent's version, that Anthony owned it, and that Anthony's approval was necessary to her obtaining it. When the agent returned and, without telling her what Anthony had said as to such approval, executed the last two instruments, purporting to sell the common stock as well as the preferred, the respondent might reasonably have inferred from such documents that she was dealing with the company in subscribing for the common as well as the preferred stock. She had been dealing with the agent, as representative of appellant, and had no reason to believe, when he signed the documents, that he was acting in a dual capacity—that is, as appellant's agent as to the preferred stock and Anthony's agent as to the common stock. Indeed, it was more reasonable for her to assume that, as the company was receiving her money, it was selling her the additional common stock than that Anthony was giving her stock without any consideration to himself. If the sale was to be other than by appellant, as apparently his writings disclosed, it was the agent's duty to have so informed respondent, and his negligence in that regard is chargeable to appellant.

[8-12] Subsequently, on the same day, the agent delivered to respondent two letters. In the first, appellant, by Anthony as its president, acknowledged the subscription for the preferred stock in the form signed by respondent. In the second, Anthony, personally, informed respondent that he was owner of the common stock, that it was escrowed and could only be transferred upon application to the corporation commissioner, and that he guaranteed that he would so apply. Appellant argues that these letters should be considered with the first three documents in arriving at the real agreement of the parties. They cannot be so considered because, prior thereto, the transaction had consummated in a contract. Neither can they be considered, in interpreting the contract, as evidence of the construction that the parties had placed upon its terms because one is written by an outsider and the other was written by only one party thereto. P. Pastene & Co. v. Greco Canning Co. (D. C.) 268 F. 168. Furthermore, each is a self-serving declaration in favor of and not against the writer. Appellant also argues that the letters evidence a substitution of Anthony for appellant as debtor for the common stock. "To accomplish a novation by the substitution of a new debtor the substitution must be with the consent of the creditor and the parties must intend that the obligation of the original debtor be released." 20 Cal. Jur. 250. The record is silent as to such consent or intent on the part of respondent.

[13] The objection that the evidence does not support the finding that the sale and delivery of the common stock was a material consideration for the contract is answered by appellant's stipulation that respondent would testify that she would not have signed the subscription agreement if she had known she was not to receive the common stock mentioned in the other two documents.

[14, 15] Notice of rescission was served eight and one-half months after the date of the contract. In the meantime, she made numerous futile attempts to obtain the common stock from Anthony. She also attended the annual stockholders' meeting. These facts, appellant claims, prove laches, debarring her from relief. Appellant further contends that relief should be denied because the parties, in contracting for the sale of the common stock in violation of the permit, were equally guilty. Neither of these contentions is well taken. First Nat. Bk. v. Thompson, 212 Cal. 388, 298 P. 808.

[16] The court sustained objections to questions asked of the agent which were designed to show that he had told her that Anthony owned the common stock. Appellant claims that these rulings were erroneous. Conceding that they were, the error is without prejudice, because, as above pointed out, the permit, printed on the reverse of the subscription agreement, stated that Anthony was the owner of the common stock, and the court found, as the agreement stated, that such permit had been exhibited to her. It is obvious, therefore, that the court, in deciding the case, considered that she knew the fact as to the ownership, and therefore the excluded evidence would have been only additional evidence as to matter already proven.

Judgment affirmed.

COLWELL v. GARDNER et al.

Civ. 4435.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 27, 1932.

1. Executors and administrators ⇐449.

That complaint alleged that services were rendered decedent at her request, while claim presented to executrices was for services furnished under contract, held not fatal variance.

2. Executors and administrators ⇐210.

Law will imply promise to compensate for services at termination thereof, where express promise to compensate by will has failed of fulfillment.

3. Executors and administrators ⇐221(5).

Evidence showed that plaintiff fully performed contract to render services to decedent during her lifetime.

4. Executors and administrators ⇐451(3).

Instruction reciting that if jury find for plaintiff, to determine reasonable value of services performed or supplies furnished to decedent as alleged in complaint, held not erroneous.

Such instruction was not erroneous where the court, in other instructions, fully instructed the jury that if plaintiff had been justly discharged and therefore did not complete his contract, he could not recover anything, and that the plaintiff must have performed each and every portion of his contract before entitled to recover anything, and that willful or gross misconduct justifying his discharge precluded his recovery.

5. Trial ⇐260(1).

Refusal to give requested instruction covered by other instructions held not error.

6. Appeal and error ⇐1067.

Failure to give defendants' instruction that if plaintiff had no contract of employment with deceased, but performed services for deceased, he can only recover reasonable value of services performed within two years previous to her death, held not prejudicial.

No prejudice resulted to defendants from the failure to give such instruction, where the jury were instructed that if no contract of service had been shown, then plaintiff could not recover, and this seemed to be the whole theory of plaintiff's case, and therefore the proffered instruction was without the issues.

7. Executors and administrators ⇐451(3).

Refusal to instruct that plaintiff could not recover if he agreed with decedent to assume with her relationship of son and mother and rendered to her such services as son would render to mother held not error.

There was no error in refusing such an instruction because there was no evidence from which the relationship of son and mother might be inferred, and the proposed instruction left out of consideration the idea of contract, for, even though the relationship had been assumed, nevertheless a legal contract could have been entered into whereby compensation was agreed upon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by John L. Colwell against Alvina E. Gardner and Anna A. Lafever, as executrices of the last will and testament of Ellen East, deceased. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Clyde Thomas, of Los Angeles, and Wesley E. Marten, of Chico, for appellants.

Ware & Ware, of Chico, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action by which plaintiff sought to recover from the estate of Ellen East certain money alleged to be due for services rendered decedent during her lifetime.

The case was tried with a jury and following a verdict for plaintiff judgment was entered in his favor. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and defendants appeal.

Before detailing the facts there are some preliminary points that may be considered.

Appellants contend that there is a fatal variance between the cause of action sued on and the claim presented to the executrices for allowance.

[1] The point is made that the complaint alleges that the services were rendered decedent at her special instance and request, while the claim presented was that the services were furnished under an agreement and contract. Hence, argues appellant, there is the variance claimed. A mere statement of the point is its own refutation, even conceding that the law requires that before an action on a claim can be maintained the claim must first be presented to the representatives of the estate.

The next claim of appellants is that the evidence does not support the contract alleged. The complaint alleges: "That between August 1, 1918, and December 29, 1928, and continuously between said dates with the exception of about two months in 1925 and three weeks of July and August, 1929, plaintiff, at the special instance and request of Ellen East, rendered constant and continuous service to her, consisting of housekeeping for her, preparing her meals, nursing and caring for her and caring for her home, and during all of said period the plaintiff, at the special instance and request of said Ellen East, furnished her groceries, meat, vegetables and fuel and supplied her home therewith and furnished at her special instance and request, for use in her home, gas, electric energy and ice; that during the time all of the said services were rendered and performed it was agreed by and between plaintiff and said Ellen East that plaintiff would perform the services and furnish the specified provisions, etc., continually during such part of the remainder of the lifetime of said Ellen East as she might require and that she would pay to plaintiff for the same the sum of $2,000 at the time of her death, and plaintiff alleges that said sum was and is the reasonable value of said services and the things so furnished and supplied."

The complaint further alleges full performance by plaintiff; the appointment and qualification of the executrices, following the death of Ellen East; the presentation of the claim against the estate of the said decedent and the rejection thereof.

The creditor's claim presented is made a part of the complaint, and after setting forth the nature of the services rendered, as in the complaint alleged, the claim reads: "That all of said services, provisions, fuel, gas, light and ice were furnished by claimant to deceased under an agreement and contract with her by the terms of which deceased agreed to pay claimant, at the time of her death, $2,000.00, which was and is the reasonable value thereof, and upon which nothing has been paid."

With this review of the pleading we may now consider appellants' claim that the evidence does not support the contract as alleged. Appellants have been meager in their presentation of the record in arguing the evidence. We have, however, gone carefully over the transcript, aided by respondent, who has given us fully the testimony of the various witnesses.

With only changing the names the situation is described exactly in the case of Warder v. Hutchison, 69 Cal. App. at page 298, 231 P. 563, being subheading No. 7 of the opinion, which we adopt as our conclusion here on this particular point.

Appellants' next point is as follows: If a contract was proven it was one to provide by will and not as alleged in the complaint.

The argument runs to the effect that the complaint sets out a contract of hiring by the terms of which plaintiff was to be compensated at the death of Ellen East, and that the proof shows nothing more than a contract or promise to make a will in favor of plaintiff.

[2] Here, again, none of the evidence is presented in support of the contention, but again we have gone to the transcript. We feel it needless to go into the details of facts. In its factual structure the case differs little from the usual run of such cases and details would simply mean change of names and places. The rule announced in Lauritsen v. Goldsmith, 99 Cal. App. 671, 672, 279 P. 168, disposes of the point now under discussion. This citation reviews the authorities to some extent. Quoting from page 675 of 99 Cal. App., 279 P. 168, 170, the court says: "In this case respondents claim that the record of testimony does not show any express contract to compensate for the services at the termination thereof, but only an express contract to compensate by will. It is true that the testimony does not show any direct promise to pay in any other way than by will. But it has been frequently held that the law will imply such a promise where the express promise to compensate by will has failed of fulfillment." In the instant case there is much credible testimony tending to establish an express contract to compensate at the termination of the service, said termination being at the time of the death of Ellen East. After death the only manner in which payment could be made would be by the prior establishment of a fund or by will; excepting that the claim could be presented and paid out of the general funds of the estate. The manner of payment is immaterial as is the necessity of the creation of any specific legacy or fund.

Appellant next urges that if the contract was one of hiring, then plaintiff failed to show full performance.

Here we come upon a direct conflict in the evidence. There was an abundance of testimony to the effect that throughout the entire period the treatment accorded Ellen East by plaintiff was of a kindly, attentive, solicitous nature. On the other hand, certain beneficiaries under the will, themselves strangers in blood, gave testimony to the contrary.

[3] It might be conceded from all of the facts that Ellen East was a sickly, aged person, of nervous and irritable temperament, and one most likely to find fault. It might further be conceded that at various times rather acute friction existed between plaintiff and Mrs. East, at which time, perhaps, both of them would, as it were, blow up, and reach the point of open hostility. However, as was to be expected, these spells were of short duration. Plaintiff would quit or be discharged and perhaps the next day return; in any event, his return would be but a matter of a few days. This would not break the term of employment or impair the fulfillment of the contract.

So, too, with the allegations of unkindliness and neglect on the part of plaintiff. The charges of appellants were denied and the jury were fully instructed on this phase of the case. We have no inclination, restrained likewise by the rule of appellate practice, to disturb a verdict on this issue which verdict is supported by substantial evidence.

If it could be determined that at any period plaintiff ceased the performance of the contract, the evidence amply supports the conclusion that such cessation was without fault on the part of plaintiff and was caused by the wrongful temporary discharge by Mrs. East.

Finally appellants attack the instructions given and refused. While general objection is made by reference to a number of instructions, appellants point out specifically but one which is subjected to criticism, and that instruction reads as follows: "If you find for the plaintiff under the evidence and these instructions, you should find for him in such amount as you, in your judgment under the evidence, may determine to be the reasonable value and worth of any services or supplies that you may find, from the evidence, were performed and furnished by plaintiff to Ellen East as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, not exceeding the sum of $2,000.00, the amount plaintiff has sued for and named in his complaint."

It will be noted that this instruction ties in to the other instructions through its prefacing phrase; likewise it limits performance to that performance as alleged in the complaint. The court, in other instructions, fully instructed the jury that if plaintiff had been justly discharged and therefore did not complete his contract he could not recover anything; further, the jury were instructed that the plaintiff must have performed each and every portion of his contract before entitled to recover anything, and that willful or gross misconduct justifying his discharge precluded his recovery.

[4, 5] Under the rule as announced in Warder v. Hutchison, 69 Cal. App. 291, 231 P. 563, we find no reversible error in the giving of the instruction. Another noteworthy thing we discover in a reading of the transcript is that the defendants requested this instruction in exactly the same words, but the court refused to give the instruction at defendants' request on the sole ground that it had been given elsewhere. This, of course, is tantamount to the court's having given the instruction at the request of defendants; hence, no claim of error could be urged.

Inasmuch as this is the only instruction offered for analysis, under appellants' contention that the setting forth of this one will suffice to show the error contained in all, we go no further on the subject of instructions given. The court refused an instruction offered by defendants as follows: "You are instructed that if you do not believe from the evidence that the plaintiff had a contract of employment with the deceased, Ellen East, but that he did perform certain services of certain value for the deceased during her lifetime he can only recover for the reasonable value of such services as were performed within two years previous to her death."

[6] We can see no prejudice resulting to appellants from the failure to give this instruction. The jury were instructed that if no contract of service had been shown, then plaintiff could not recover, and this seemed to be the whole theory of plaintiff's case. To have told the jury then that plaintiff could recover for the value of the services for two years preceding the death of Ellen East in the absence of a contract might have been a favorable instruction for plaintiff but its refusal could in no sense have harmed appellants. We think the proffered instruction was without the issues.

Appellants then claim that the court erred in its refusal to instruct the jury that if on the evidence of the case they believed that plaintiff had agreed with decedent during her lifetime to assume with her the relationship of son and mother and that he lived with her in her home in such relationship and rendered to her such services as a son would render to his mother, then plaintiff would not be entitled to recover.

[7] There was no error in refusing such an instruction. There was no evidence in the case from which such a relationship might be inferred. There is a difference between services growing out of such a relationship and the case of such a relationship growing out of services.

Any person, under an agreement, might render services equaling those usually expected from a son or relative and yet not assume such a relationship as would negative the terms of the contract. In Mayborne v. Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, 46 Cal. App. 178, 183, 188 P. 1034, 1037, it is said: "The cases wherein such services are presumed to be gratuitous rest upon some natural or conventional obligation of mutual care and consideration, and the present instance hardly belongs to that class. Plaintiff was under no legal or moral duty to render services to Dutton. In contemplation of law they were strangers to each other, and as between such the law says that beneficial services rendered and accepted must be paid for."

Aside from this the proposed instruction leaves out of consideration the idea of contract at all. Even though the relationship had been assumed, nevertheless a legal contract could have been entered into wherein and whereby compensation was agreed upon. Lastly, appellants complain of the court's admission of testimony showing the reasonable value of the service rendered. We have to some extent covered this ground, but it will suffice to add that the case of Warder v. Hutchison, 69 Cal. App., 291, 299, 231 P. 563, answers every contention of appellant herein.

Concluding, we may adopt the language of respondent and state that we know of no case that has found its way into the reports of either our Supreme or Appellate courts where, in this character of a case, a plaintiff's claim was so conclusively and overwhelmingly established.

All of the propositions of law advanced by appellants have been heretofore decided adversely to their contentions, and the judgment appealed from, as well as the order denying a new trial, should be, and each and both are, affirmed.

GENERAL ENGINEERING & DRY DOCK CO. et al. v. EAST BAY MUNICIPAL UTILITY DIST.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Taxpayers may join in action to void tax levied by municipal utility district and to recover several amounts paid under protest (Code Civ. Proc. § 378).

2. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Municipal utility district is not prohibited by Constitution from incurring in any one year indebtedness in excess of income for such year (Const. art. 11, § 18).

3. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Powers of municipal utility district in respect of indebtedness depend on organic act and may be changed at will of Legislature (St. 1921, p. 245, as amended).

4. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Taxpayers seeking to void tax levied by municipal utility district must plead facts showing that indebtedness incurred transcended statutory powers if violation of statute is relied on (St. 1921, p. 245, as amended).

5. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Purchase by municipal utility district of water company's assets subject to mortgage indebtedness was not giving or lending of credit of such utility district to another within prohibitory provisions of Constitution (Const. art. 4, § 31).

6. Constitutional law ⇐93(1), 119.

Levy of tax by municipal utility district to take care of bonded debt on property purchased held valid and not impairment of obligation of contract nor infringement of vested rights of taxpayers (St. 1921, p. 245, as amended).

7. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Legislature has plenary power within constitutional limitations, to change or revoke powers of municipal utility district (St. 1921, p. 245, as amended).

8. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

In action to void tax levied by municipal utility district, allegations of complaint relating to district's power and duty to fix water rates are good on demurrer only so far as they accord with the law (St. 1921, pp. 251, 257, 258, §§ 12, 18, 20(1), as amended by St. 1929, pp. 63, 66, 67, §§ 4, 8, 9).

9. Waters and water courses ⇐203(10).

Provision in organic act that "as far as possible" utilities shall be self-supporting, but unreasonable rates need not be fixed, does not refer to mere physical power unrestrained by considerations of propriety and justice (St. 1921, pp. 251, 257, 258, §§ 12, 18, 20(1), as amended by St. 1929, pp. 63, 66, 67, §§ 4, 8, 9).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "As Far As," see Words and Phrases.]

10. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Tax levied by municipal utility district to take care of bonded indebtedness on properties acquired, where revenue derived from water rates was insufficient, held valid (St. 1921, pp. 251, 257, 258, §§ 12, 18, 20(1), as amended by St. 1929, pp. 63, 66, 67, §§ 4, 8, 9).

11. Municipal corporations ⇐956(1).

Power of taxation is essential to existence of public corporation or utility, and is never denied except where prohibited in clearest terms.

12. Waters and water courses ⇐203(10).

Legislature did not intend that financial needs, without regard to reasonableness, should control water rates of municipal utility district (St. 1921, pp. 251, 257, 258, §§ 12, 18, 20(1), as amended by St. 1929, pp. 63, 66, 67, §§ 4, 8, 9).

13. Waters and water courses ⇐183½.

Complaint seeking to void tax levied by municipal utility district to take care of bonded indebtedness is insufficient, where it shows no fraud or abuse of discretion granted by Legislature (St. 1921, pp. 251, 257, 258, §§ 12, 18, 20(1), as amended by St. 1929, pp. 63, 66, 67, §§ 4, 8, 9).

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by the General Engineering & Dry Dock Company and others against the East Bay Municipal Utility District. From judgment for defendant, on demurrer to second amended complaint, plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

James H. Boyer, of Oakland, and H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for appellants.

T. P. Wittschen, L. W. Irving, and Harold Raines, all of Oakland, for respondent.

GEORGE H. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

This action was brought by the above-named five plaintiffs to secure a judgment of the court decreeing to be void the assessment and tax levied and collected by the defendant district for the fiscal year 1929 and adjudging that the sums paid by each of the said plaintiffs respectively as such tax be returned. The complaint was divided into ten counts; each of said plaintiffs being an active complainant in two of such counts. The demurrer of the defendant to plaintiffs' second amended complaint as it finally read by amendment was sustained by the court without leave to amend. Thereafter judgment in favor of the defendant was entered, from which judgment the plaintiffs have appealed. The question presented by this appeal is accordingly one of pleading: Was the court in error in so sustaining the demurrer interposed?

In the said complaint for the recovery of the tax that had been paid under protest, each of said five plaintiffs asserted as one cause of action that said tax so paid should be returned because of the alleged illegality of certain indebtedness of the defendant utility district in the purchase of the properties of the East Bay Water Company, which company was the predecessor of the defendant in the supplying of water to the area served and was a privately owned utility, and, as a second cause of action, that said tax so paid should be returned, for the reason that, under the organic law (Stats. 1921, p. 245, chap. 218) under which the district was organized and was being operated, it was contemplated and intended that the district should be self-sustaining, that is, sustained from the revenues derived from the operation of the public utilities (section 18 of said act, Stats. 1921, p. 257), and that, as the defendant had as a fact embarked on and engaged in the business of selling water, it was required to fix rates in such amounts that the returns from the commodity sold would be sufficient to meet all its legitimate expenses and demands, and that the defendant, failing so to do, had no power to levy the tax in question.

The assessment and tax attacked by the plaintiffs as taxpayers of the utility district was one of 50 cents on each $100 assessed valuation of all property in said district, including the properties of the plaintiffs, levied by the defendant on August 28, 1929, by resolution reading as follows: "Resolution No. 2329 Fixing the amount of money necessary to be raised by taxation and levying a tax upon all property within the East Bay Municipal Utility District. Introduced by Director Johnston: Seconded by Director Latham. Resolved by the Board of Directors of the East Bay Municipal Utility District 1. That in the opinion of the Board of Directors of this District the revenues thereof will not be sufficient to pay the principal or interest on the bonded debt of the District as it becomes due or to carry out the objects and purposes of the District and that the amount of money necessary to be raised therefor by taxation is the sum of $2,031,650.00. 2. That said Board of Directors having heretofore elected to avail itself of the assessments made by the Assessors of the Counties of Alameda and Contra Costa, respectively, and to take such assessments as the basis for District taxation and to have its taxes collected by the county officials of such counties. Now, therefore, pursuant to law the said Board of Directors does fix the rate of taxation for the East Bay Municipal Utility District for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1929, and ending June 30, 1930, at 50 cents upon each hundred dollars of the valuation of property as so assessed by the said county assessors of Alameda and Contra Costa Counties for the property within each respective County, said rate of tax being sufficient to raise the amount hereinbefore fixed by the said Board of Directors as required by law; and said Board of Directors does hereby levy a tax at said rate on all property within the District. 3. The Secretary is hereby instructed to immediately transmit to the county auditors of said counties, respectively, a statement of the rate of taxation so fixed and of the tax levy so made by the said Board of Directors by filing with each of said county auditors a certified copy of this Resolution. 4. That out of the sum raised by the foregoing tax levy there shall be set aside a sufficient sum to provide for sinking funds to meet the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the District as same becomes due; there shall next be reserved a sufficient sum to pay the interest on any of such bonds and any bonds that may be issued by the District which interest may become due before the next general tax levy; any balance of the sum so raised shall be used to carry out the objects and purposes of the District."

The defendant demurred generally to the entire complaint and also upon the ground of misjoinder and demurred generally and specially to each count.

The first cause of action, that set forth in the first count and in all the odd-numbered counts of the complaint, will be first considered. The substance of the allegations material and pertinent to the attacks made by the demurrer would appear to be as follows: On December 8, 1928, the East Bay Water Company, a private corporation for profit, owned and operated a public utility supplying water to the inhabitants of the district; that such company was indebted in an amount exceeding $20,790,700, evidenced by bonds theretofore issued and sold, which indebtedness was and is secured by mortgages and deeds of trust upon all the real and personal property of the company, that said company was also indebted in an aggregate amount of $600,000, which indebtedness was entirely unsecured; that on November 1, 1927, the electors of the district authorized a bond issue of $26,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds to be used in the acquisition or construction of a water distribution system; that such bonds were the only bonds ever voted or authorized by the electors of said utility district for the acquisition or construction of a distribution system, and that the proceeds from the sale of said bonds were and are the only funds or property of the district available for such purpose; that on December 7, 1928, the district, acting through its officers, and without submitting the matter to popular vote, in one transaction, purchased from the water company all of its real and personal property and all of its preferred and common stock; that in the consummation of this transaction the district paid the owners of the stock the sum of $13,962,200, and assumed the payment of the said outstanding bonded indebtedness and also the unsecured indebtedness above referred to, and that the said bonded indebtedness is now a lien upon the property of the district; that the bonded indebtedness so assumed bears interest at 5½ per cent. per annum; that on December 8, 1928, the water company transferred and delivered possession of its property subject to the lien of the bonded indebtedness to the district, and caused to be transferred to the district all the common and preferred stock, and that since said date the district has been and is in possession of all such property, and is operating a water system throughout the district, selling water to its inhabitants; that on August 28, 1928, the utility district levied a tax and passed the resolution hereinbefore set forth; that said tax was levied by said utility district to provide funds to meet and pay the interest on said indebtedness assumed and incurred by it and to meet and pay the annual expenses of the government of said district and the operating expenses of said utility, and to provide funds wherewith to pay and satisfy said indebtedness assumed by it; that plaintiffs at the time of paying said taxes signed, executed, and served on said tax collector a written protest describing its said property, and reading in paragraphs 1 to 5 thereof as follows:

"Protest: To the Tax Collector of the County of Alameda, State of California, and to the East Bay Municipal Utility District: The undersigned owner of the hereinafter described property, situate in said utility district, hereby protests against the assessment, levy and collection of a tax thereon, for the fiscal year 1929, by said East Bay Municipal Utility District, and hereby pays said tax under protest, upon the following grounds, to-wit: 1. That said assessment and tax are in violation of law and wholly void; 2. That said assessment and the levying and collection of such tax are in excess of the powers of the Board of Directors of such utility district. 3. That said assessment was made and said tax was levied in part to meet the huge deficit existing from the operation of a water system by said district, which deficit resulted from the failure of the board of directors of said district to fix such charges for such water furnished by said district as would pay the expenses of the government of said district, including salaries, office expenses and other necessary disbursements, the operating expenses of the said utility, the interest on the bonded indebtedness incurred for the acquisition, construction and completion thereof, and provide a sinking or other appropriate fund for the payment of the principal of such debt as it becomes due, and also provide an appropriate fund for repairs, replacements and betterments, when by the provisions of the Organic Act under which said district was created, and under which bonds in the amount of sixty-five million dollars were voted by the electors of said district, said district was and is required to pay all charges and expenditures of the district, and the interest and principal of its bonded debt, from the revenues derived by the district from the operation of its public utilities, and that each public utility owned and operated by said district shall be self-sustaining; and during the entire year 1929 said utility district has owned and operated a water system and has fixed charges for such water, and has collected revenues therefrom, and can fix such charges and collect such revenues therefrom as will pay all such charges and expenses of said district and render such district self-sustaining; 4. That said assessment was made and said tax was levied to assist in the payment of a portion of the indebtedness incurred by said utility district during the fiscal year 1928, without the approval of a two-thirds vote of the electors of said district, voting on the proposition to incur such indebtedness, and which indebtedness exceeded the ordinary annual income and revenue of said district for said fiscal year 1928; 5. That said assessment was made and said tax was in part levied for the purpose of satisfying an obligation incurred by said utility district in giving, lending and pledging the credit of said utility district by the assumption by said district, during the fiscal year 1928, of the payment of a bonded indebtedness of approximately twenty-one million dollars, then owing and unpaid by the East Bay Water Company, a private corporation, and its predecessors in interest." And that said assessment and tax are illegal and void for all the reasons specified in said written protest as more fully appears by the statement of facts in the complaint contained.

[1-4] As to the insufficiency of the complaint: We think there is no misjoinder, and that the plaintiffs are properly joined, under the provisions of section 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is likewise clear that a district such as defendant is not within the inhibition of the provisions of section 18, article 11, of the Constitution, which prohibits any county, city, town, township, or school district from incurring in any one year an indebtedness in excess of the annual income of that year. Bliss v. Hamilton, 171 Cal. 123, 152 P. 303; East Bay Dist. v. Railroad Com., 194 Cal. 603, 229 P. 949; In re East Bay, etc., Water Bonds of 1925, 196 Cal. 725, 239 P. 38. For any inhibition of such kind as against the defendant herein, the terms of the organic act (Stats. 1921, pp. 245, 251, § 12, and the later amendments), must be referred to; and, as such inhibition or limitation is statutory and not constitutional, it may be changed or be entirely dispensed with at the will of the Legislature. Accordingly, if the plaintiffs relied on such statutory limitation or inhibition, and if they wished to show that the defendant herein was affected thereby, it was incumbent on them in their complaint to set forth the facts existing from which under the statute such inhibition or limitation would follow.

It is further contended that the contract of purchase entered into December 7, 1928, between the defendant and the East Bay Water Company by which "the former contracted to and did purchase all of the preferred and common stock of the latter company for $13,962,000 and assumed the unsecured indebtedness of the water company, and bought the real and personal property of said water company, subject to a mortgage indebtedness of $20,790,000 which indebtedness said utility district, by said contract of purchase, assumed and agreed to pay" was prohibited by section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution, the said section containing the following provisions: "The legislature shall have no power * * * to authorize the giving or lending, of the credit * * * of any county * * * or other political corporation or subdivision of the state now existing, or that be hereafter established, in aid of or to any person, association, or corporation, whether municipal or otherwise, or to pledge the credit thereof, in any manner whatever, for the payment of the liabilities of any individual, association, municipal or other corporation whatever; * * * and it shall not have power to authorize the state, or any political subdivision thereof, to subscribe for stock, or to become a stockholder in any corporation whatever;" and it is likewise contended that the bonds referred to in the complaint were voted for the construction or acquisition of a distribution system, and not for the purpose of buying stock in a private corporation or of guaranteeing or paying an indebtedness incurred by a private corporation.

It is, however, alleged in the complaint that the defendant "purchased from said East Bay Water Company all of said real and personal property owned by it as aforesaid and purchased all of the preferred and common stock of said East Bay Water Company then issued and outstanding, and amounting to 130,872 shares" (paragraph VIII), and "That on the 8th day of December, 1928, said East Bay Water Company transferred and delivered possession of all of its said real and personal property, subject to said liens and encumbrances as aforesaid, to said utility district, and caused to be transferred to said utility district all of said common and preferred stock; and ever since last mentioned date said defendant, East Bay Municipal Utility District, has been and still is in possession of all of said properties and stock, and has been and still is operating a water system throughout said utility district, and has been and still is distributing and selling water to the inhabitants of said utility district." Paragraph XI.

[5] Obviously, the foregoing is a very clear allegation that the defendant purchased all the properties of the East Bay Water Company, and that it has succeeded thereto and is now the owner and in possession thereof. Where there is such an admitted situation of "purchase" and "sole ownership," there is no "giving or lending of credit" within the meaning of any such prohibitory provisions. The situation contemplated by the prohibitory measure is not present; for the "purchase of all the property" and the "sole ownership" of all the property preclude the conclusion that there has been any joinder with another as an interested party or aided party or that what was done was done in the interest or for the benefit of anyone other than the "purchaser" and "owner." In the reported cases dealing with alleged violations of such a provision as the one recited, we know of no instance where an owner in "the sole control and management" of acquired property as in the situation herein made to appear has been held to come within any such constitutional or statutory provisions. This distinction incident to "purchase," "exchange," and "sole ownership" is illustrated by the following cases: Sun Publishing Ass'n v.

Mayor, 152 N. Y. 257, 46 N. E. 499, 37 L. R. A. 788; Brooke v. Philadelphia, 162 Pa. 123, 29 A. 387, 24 L. R. A. 781; Prince v. Crocker, 166 Mass. 347, 44 N. E. 446, 32 L. R. A. 610; Walker v. City of Cincinnati, 21 Ohio St. 14, 8 Am. Rep. 24; Admiral Realty Co. v. City of New York, 206 N. Y. 110, 99 N. E. 241, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1054; Chicago v. P., C., C. & St. L. Ry. Co., 244 Ill. 220, 91 N. E. 422, 135 Am. St. Rep. 316; Maffit v. City of Decatur, 322 Ill. 82, 152 N. E. 602.

Further in this regard, the case of People ex rel. Murphy v. Kelly, 76 N. Y. 475, dealing with the construction and acquisition of the Brooklyn bridge, affords a very clear illustration of the application of this distinction to a transfer wherein and whereby two public corporations took over and acquired all the property of a private corporation. Therein under a constitutional amendment effective January 1, 1875 (Const. art. 8, § 11), reading: "No county, city, town or village shall hereafter give any money or property, or loan its * * * credit to or in aid of any individual, association or corporation, or become directly or indirectly the owner of stock in, or bonds of, any association or corporation; nor shall any such county, city, town or village be allowed to incur any indebtedness except for county, city, town or village purposes," it was contended that an act passed May 14, 1875 (Laws N. Y. 1875, c. 300) providing that "the bridge in the course of construction over the East river, between the cities of New York and Brooklyn, by the New York Bridge Company, shall be a public work of the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and for the dissolution of said company, and the completion and management of the said bridge, by the said cities," was in conflict with the constitutional provisions just recited; but the court held that it was not the purpose or the effect of the act to make the city of New York a stockholder in the bridge company or to cause it to loan any money or credit to such company. It was the purpose of the act to extinguish the company and vest all its property in the two cities for a public purpose. The cities already owned most of the stock and property of the company, and a way was provided by which they could become the owners of the balance of the property. All the money they paid for stock or upon the debts of the company was simply in furtherance of the purpose to vest the property of the bridge in the two cities, and it was not paid to aid the company or to make the cities stockholders therein. The effect was to be the dissolution of the company and the transfer of its property.

Under the allegations of the complaint that on December 7, 1928, the defendant acquired the ownership of the East Bay Water Company properties, and is now in possession and in operation thereof, and it appearing that such acquisition was but the purpose and object of what was done, we can see no basis or support for the contention that the credit of the state or of the district was loaned or that section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution was in any way violated.

[6] It is contended further that the levy of August 28, 1929, was in violation of the constitutional provision prohibiting impairing the obligation of contract. Of course, if the said tax levy or the amendments of the organic utility act evidently relied upon by the district as warranting the making of said levy in the manner in which it was impaired the obligation of contract, they would be obnoxious to such provision; but within the meaning of the said prohibitory provision we cannot see that the district under the exercise of this power of taxation which the state has seen proper to grant to the district has impaired any one's contract or that there is any contract or contractual relationship with the district or with the state or with any one else that is shown to be affected or impaired by the tax levy in question.

[7] The other limitations relied on by plaintiffs to support their contention as to the illegality and invalidity of the purchase of December 7, 1928, and of the levy of August 28, 1929, are statutory and not constitutional limitations; and hence they are what may be changed or be entirely dispensed with at the will of the Legislature. Under the situation herein presented, we are of the opinion that the Legislature had the plenary power also to change, revoke, lessen, or enlarge the powers that are herein involved of the district, and that the scheme set forth in Statutes of 1921, p. 245, and amendments thereto, is framed on the ground and theory that there is reserved to the Legislature such plenary power and right so to amend when it may be deemed expedient or proper so to do—a power and right restrained only by the necessity of protecting vested rights. In the legislation and subsequent tax levy here involved, no vested rights on the part of the plaintiffs were affected or impaired. City of Sacramento v. Adams, 171 Cal. 458, 153 P. 908; La Mesa, etc., Irr. Dist. v. Halley, 197 Cal. 50, 239 P. 719; Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 24 S. Ct. 107, 48 L. Ed. 229; Spurrier v. Neumiller, 37 Cal. App. 683, 174 P. 338.

Entertaining the view that the levy of August 28, 1929, is supported by the taxing power granted the district under the terms of the organic act, and is in substantial conformity with the power so granted, and that the allegations of count 1 and the odd-numbered counts of the complaint relied on by the plaintiffs do not under the terms of the organic act set forth wherein the levy complained of is illegal or invalid by reason of anything prohibited by law, we hold that the demurrer for insufficiency of facts, in this aspect was good.

The second cause of action, that set forth in the second count and in all the even-numbered counts of the complaint, will now be taken up. The substance of the allegations material and pertinent to the attacks made by the demurrer appear to be as follows:

That on December 8, 1928, the district acquired a distribution system, and that at all times since said date the defendant has been engaged in the business of distributing and selling water to the inhabitants of said district, and is the only medium distributing water to its inhabitants, the population of which exceeds 450,000 people, and has enjoyed a monopoly in the sale of such water; that at all times since said December 8, 1928, said utility district could and now can fix such charges for said water distributed and sold by it as aforesaid and at all times since last-mentioned date could and now can collect such revenues from the operation of said water system and public utility as will pay and meet all legal expenses and lawful obligations and render said district self-sustaining; that the district's sole revenue since December 8, 1928, is derived from the sale of water; that at all times since December 8, 1928, the annual expenses of the district exceed $6,700,000; the rates fixed by the district are such as to produce a sum which falls short of $6,700,000 by $2,200,000, thereby causing an annual deficit in the operation of said water system project and the maintenance of said district of more than $2,200,000; and to meet such deficit levied the tax in dispute in this action; that said tax was levied by said utility district to provide funds to meet and pay the interest on indebtedness assumed and incurred by it and to meet and pay the annual expenses of the government of said district and the operating expenses of said utility and to provide funds wherewith to pay and satisfy said indebtedness assumed by it.

It will be noted that the East Bay Water Company's system was taken over December 8, 1928, and that the tax levy herein attacked was made on August 28, 1929, and was for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1929, and ending on June 30, 1930. The resolution making the said levy and the protest of plaintiffs against the tax have both been recited in the first part of this opinion. It thus appears that during the fiscal year of 1928 the defendant had operated the said water system for approximately seven months, and that at the time of the levy the second month of the fiscal year of 1929 was drawing to a close; and it would also appear from the recitals of the resolution that the board had determined that under the situation confronting the district, in that "the revenues thereof will not be sufficient to pay the principal or interest on the bonded debt of the District as it becomes due or to carry out the objects and purposes of the District," it was necessary to raise by taxation the sum of $2,031,650. To raise such amount, said tax of 50 cents upon each $100 of the assessed valuation of the property of the district was levied.

It is contended by plaintiffs that, the district having since December 8, 1928, engaged in the business of selling water to the consumers thereof in said district, and having the power to fix rates, it should have met all its legal obligations from the sale of such water at rates made high enough to effect such result, and, failing so to do, it was prohibited by law from thereafter levying or collecting taxes.

[8] The allegations of the complaint in so far as they may be regarded as dealing with or as asserting the "power" of the defendant district to make or fix rates without limit or restriction and its duty to do so, must, under the familiar rule in demurrer, be accorded only such force and effect as they derive from the law; in other words, such allegations are good and well pleaded only to the extent that they accord with the law.

At the time of the levy, the tax powers of the district in particulars pertinent to this consideration embraced, among others, the following provisions: "Sec. 12. Any municipal utility district incorporated as herein provided shall have power: * * * Fourth —To take by grant, purchase, gift, devise, or lease, or condemn in proceedings under eminent domain, or otherwise acquire, and to hold and enjoy real and personal property of every kind within or without the district necessary to the full or convenient exercise of its powers. The directors of the district may lease, mortgage, sell or otherwise dispose of any real or personal property within or without the district when in their judgment it is for the best interests of the district so to do. The provisions of this section shall apply to all sales or mortgages heretofore or hereafter made. * * * Eighth—To borrow money and incur indebtedness, and to issue bonds or other evidences of such indebtedness; also to refund or retire any indebtedness that may exist against or be assumed by the district; provided, no indebtedness shall be incurred exceeding the ordinary annual income and revenue of the district without the approval of a two-thirds vote of the electors voting on the proposition to incur such indebtedness; provided, however, that a further vote of the electors is not required for any indebtedness heretofore or hereafter incurred within the purposes and not exceeding the available amount of any previously authorized bond issue and as to such indebtedness the proceeds of any of such bonds unexpended in the treasury of the district, or the par value of any of such bonds which are unsold shall be deemed a part of the ordinary annual income and revenue of such district." "Sec. 20. (1) If, in the opinion of the board of directors, the revenues will not be sufficient to pay the principal or interest on any bonded debt as it becomes due, or to carry out the objects and purposes of the district, then said board shall levy a tax for such purpose or purposes and fix the amount of money necessary to be raised therefor by taxation. The words 'revenue producing utilities' as used in this act shall be deemed to mean such utilities as those from which revenue is customary or may be derived by means of charges, rates, or rentals imposed upon or collected from users, consumers or customers thereof, together with such works, facilities and appliances used or useful in connection therewith or incidental thereto." Stats. 1929, pp. 63, 64 and 67, §§ 4, 8. "Sec. 18. Only revenue producing utilities shall be acquired, owned or operated by a district formed under the provisions of this act. The rates and charges for commodities or service furnished shall be fixed by the board of directors. As far as possible utilities shall be self-supporting but in order so to do the board shall not be required to fix a rate which in its opinion is unreasonably high, nor to cover large expenditures and the interest thereon required for future needs and development." Stats. 1929, pp. 66, 67, § 9. The latter (section 18) read as originally enacted (see Stats. 1921, p. 257) as follows: "Sec. 18. Only revenue producing utilities shall be acquired, owned or operated by a district formed under the provisions of this act. So far as possible the board of directors shall fix such charges for commodities or service furnished by any revenue producing utility, as will pay the expenses of the government of the district, including salaries, offices expenses, and other necessary disbursements; the operating expenses of the utility; the interest on any bonded indebtedness incurred for the acquisition, construction and completion thereof; and provide a sinking or other appropriate fund for the payment of the principal of such debt as it may become due, and also provide an appropriate fund for repairs, replacements and betterments; it being the intention of this section that the district pay all of such charges and expenditures, and the interest and principal of its bonded debt, from the revenues derived by the district from the operation of its public utilities, and that each public utility owned and operated by the district shall be self-sustaining." And subdivision 1 of section 20 as originally enacted (see Stats. 1921, p. 258) read as follows: "Sec. 20. (1) If from any cause the revenues of the district shall be inadequate to pay the principal or interest on any bonded debt as it becomes due, the board of directors must, or if funds are needed to carry out the objects and purposes of the district, which can not be provided for out of the revenues of the district, then the board of directors may, levy a tax for such purposes as herein provided. The board shall state the purposes for which such taxes are necessary, and must fix, by resolution, the amount of money necessary to be so raised by taxation."

[9] It will be noted that section 18 of the organic act as in effect at the time of the tax levy provides that, "as far as possible utilities shall be self-supporting but in order so to do the board shall not be required to fix a rate which in its opinion is unreasonably high, nor to cover large expenditures and the interest thereon required for future needs and development," and it will also be noted that said section 18 as originally enacted and until changed by amendment provided that "so far as possible the board of directors shall fix such charges for commodities or service furnished by any revenue producing utility, as will pay the expenses of the government of the district * * *" and make the district self-supporting. When we take into consideration the context and the manifest purpose of the act, in what sense are we to understand these words "so far as possible?" Are they to be understood to have reference to the exercise of a mere physical power or to have the exercise of power unrestricted by considerations involving the justness or fairness or propriety of so doing or the probable results thereof in so far as the district was concerned? The meaning to be attached to such words as "if possible," "as soon as possible," "as far as possible," "so far as possible," is very frequently, as it is here in our opinion with regard to "so far as possible," controlled and restricted by the context, the subject-matter, and the manifest result sought to be attained under the entire scheme projected. Such restricted signification will be and should be attached where it is manifest from the context, the subject-matter, and the obvious result sought to be attained, that considerations of propriety and reasonableness involving some range of judgment and discretion, inhere. Pyles v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 97 Kan. 455, 155 P. 788; Forbes v. Mohr, 69 Kan. 342, 76 P. 827; Vanderslice v. Newton, 4 N. Y. 130.

[10] That conditions may arise in the launching of a utility district that may make it necessary and expedient to have recourse to the taxing power is a circumstance that has been noticed and recognized by the court in Re East Bay, etc., Water Bonds of 1925, supra. That the district is clothed under the organic act with a taxing power such as was made use of and exercised in this tax levy we think is clearly manifest from the terms of the act. The power is granted in express terms, and the levy made by the defendant is virtually cast in the express terms of the act.

[11] Moreover, as a general proposition the power of taxation is regarded as a most important and essential attribute of a public corporation or utility in order that there may be the ability to function generally and freely under exigencies and situations that may present themselves, and unless the exercise of such power is in the clearest of terms prohibited, it is never denied. Avery v. Job, 25 Or. 512, 36 P. 293; Attorney General v. Salem, 103 Mass. 138; Carlton v. Salem, 103 Mass. 141; Sinclair v. Mayor of Fall River, 198 Mass. 248, 84 N. E. 453; St. Louis-S. F. Ry. Co. v. Andrews, 137 Okl. 222, 278 P. 617; In re Orosi Public Utility Dist., 196 Cal. 43, 235 P. 1004; City of Pasadena v. Chamberlain, 204 Cal. 653, 269 P. 630; People ex rel. Woolsey v. Common Council of Long Island City, 76 N. Y. 20.

[12] Nor can it be thought that it was the intention or within the contemplation of the Legislature that the fact that the district needed the money or that it was under the necessity of raising money in a given amount should be considered as the controlling factor in fixing or setting a price or rate for the water which it was called upon to distribute to its patrons, and that any question of the reasonableness or fairness of such set price, relatively speaking, as compared with prices for water generally, should be ignored and disregarded. A fair market value or fair service value is not generally regarded as being dependent upon mere financial necessity or exigency, or as being such as will satisfy such necessity or exigency. Pond, Public Utilities, § 545; Feil v. City of Coeur d'Alene, 23 Idaho, 32, 129 P. 643, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095; Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 18 S. Ct. 418, 42 L. Ed. 819.

[13] The powers of the district particularly involved herein appear in the organic act (Stats. 1921, pp. 245 to 261) as amended by Statutes of 1927, pp. 61, 63, 65, 69, and as amended by chapter 31, Statutes of 1929, pp. 58 to 70, wherein, among other things, sections 18 and 20 were amended, effective August 14, 1929, and section 12 was amended, effective March 29, 1929, by amending subdivision 4 of said section 12 relating to the acquisition and disposing of real and personal property, providing the right to mortgage same and ratifying sales and mortgages and by amending subdivision 8 thereof relating to the indebtedness of such districts including "any indebtedness heretofore or hereafter incurred. * * *" We think that, under the powers so appearing to have been granted to the defendant, the express recognition by the Legislature of the prior existence of such power in the defendant and the ratification of past acts of the defendant referable to such powers, we must regard the defendant as having proceeded with legal warrant and in the exercise of a vested discretion in making the tax levy of August 28, 1929, as was done, notwithstanding the defendant at such time was in the possession of the water system and had been operating it since December 8, 1928. Accordingly, the allegations of the complaint are insufficient, in that they do not show on the part of the defendant and to the oppression of the plaintiffs any fraud, or any abuse of the authority and discretion granted by the Legislature. 2 High, Injunctions, § 1240; People ex rel. Carter v. Rice, 135 N. Y. 473, 31 N. E. 921, 16 L. R. A. 836, 850, 851.

In that the said allegations of count 2 and of each even-numbered count are insufficient, and that the allegations of count 1 and of each odd-numbered count are also insufficient as hereinabove mentioned, the judgment of the lower court should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

STICH et al. v. GORDON et al.

Civ. 8575.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 28, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇐288.

Action in unlawful detainer is one for possession with right to recover damages as an incident and, ordinarily, lease involved is forfeited.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇐291(14).

In unlawful detainer, damages are limited to amount of rental where failure to pay rent is the breach, with treble damages if withholding is willful.

3. Chattel mortgages ⇐255.

In unlawful detainer, the chattel mortgage, so far as it secures payment of the rent incorporated in judgment for damages, is not destroyed.

4. Landlord and tenant ⇐291(14).

Where, in unlawful detainer, landlords claimed wrongful withholding and prayed for receiver, damages, and forfeiture, they could not recover damages during receiver's entire possession.

5. Landlord and tenant ⇐291(17).

Where tenant makes it obvious that privilege to restore lease by payment of damages is not desired, judgment in unlawful detainer need not offer such privilege (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174).

6. Landlord and tenant ⇐291(17).

Where, in unlawful detainer, court appointed receiver but failed to find when he took possession, or whether his possession was entire, allowed landlords damages for period receiver was in possession, and forfeited lease, judgment must be reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by F. M. Stich and Charles D. Wilke against Olney G. Gordon and Anna A. Gordon, his wife, and others. From judgment for plaintiffs, named defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Clarence A. Linn, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Charles W. Lynch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANDERSON, Justice pro tem.

The action is in unlawful detainer. Plaintiffs, the landlords, prevailed. The defendants, who appealed, occupied the premises involved, consisting of an apartment house, as assignees of the original tenants. Unless otherwise indicated, the word "defendants" will apply to appellants only and the answer referred to will be their answer. The defendants had assumed the lease, which ran for ten years, from July 1, 1926; the rental being $1,850 per month, payable on the 15th day of each month. The rental falling due on May 15, 1930, and on June 15, 1930, was not paid. The complaint was filed June 30, 1930. It joined all necessary parties and contained all necessary averments. It prayed for possession, for damages, for forfeiture of the lease, and that a receiver should be appointed. The complaint alleged that notice, addressed to the defendants and requiring the payment of the delinquent rental or the surrender of the possession of the premises, was served on the various defendants on June 24, 1930. A receiver was appointed on July 17, 1930, upon plaintiffs' application. The answer of the appealing defendants was filed on September 25, 1930. The answer admitted the averments of the complaint and prayed that the plaintiffs be awarded damages in the sum of $3,820, the amount of rental figured for the period from May 15, 1930, to the time of the appointment of the receiver on July 17, 1930, and that interest should be allowed on this delinquent rental. The answer also prayed for a forfeiture of the lease. While the answer pleaded the appointment of a receiver on July 17, 1930, and that the receiver took charge of the premises, it failed to state the exact date the receiver obtained complete possession of the premises. Finding 4 recites the appointment of a receiver, but it fails to state when the receiver took possession. It was found that the appealing defendants—the defendants who had assumed the lease—left the premises, but continued to collect rent from subtenants through an agent. Summons was ordered published. The filing of the answer was delayed until September 25, 1930. The evidence showed that the defendants owned the furniture in the apartments. It had been mortgaged to secure the rent. Defendants finally offered to plaintiffs a certain amount of rental on condition the furniture should be delivered. The offer was not acted upon.

The case was not tried until October 20, 1930. Judgment was not rendered until December 16, 1930. The judgment shows that various subtenants had been served with summons and complaint and that they had defaulted. Exactly when they defaulted does not appear. The original lessees filed an answer, but they are not complaining of the judgment. It is not disputed that the order appointing the receiver continued in effect down to the date of the judgment on December 16, 1930.

The trial court awarded plaintiffs judgment for damages in the sum of $12,950. It fixed these damages by taking the amount of the rental for the full period from May 15, 1930, to December 15, 1930. Against this the judgment allowed as a credit the net earnings of the property involved during the period of receivership. These earnings had not as yet been determined by court order. The record indicates that they were later determined, and that they were received by plaintiffs. Neither side objects to the fact that this is irregularly shown by certain records in the clerk's transcript. Both sides concede that the average monthly earnings of the property during the receivership was far less than the monthly rental called for by the lease. The judgment declared the lease forfeited. The judgment contained a provision to the effect that if the damages awarded were satisfied within five days by the specified persons interested in the term of the lease, the defendants would be restored to their estate. But the record conclusively shows that defendants did not desire to avail themselves of this provision.

The appellants complain of the judgment only in so far as it allowed damages equal to the rental for the period of the receivership. The plaintiff Stich testified that the receiver took possession of the apartments on July 17, 1930, and had continued in possession thereof up to the time of the trial. The appellants rely on the case of Telegraph Avenue Corporation v. Raentsch, 205 Cal. 93, 269 P. 1109, 61 A. L. R. 366. That was a case in unlawful detainer. A receiver was appointed at the instance of the plaintiff. It appeared in that case that the receiver, through attornment of subtenants or otherwise, took possession of all the property involved. It was ruled that it was error to allow damages for withholding the leased premises during the period of the receivership. The case is directly in point. Respondents point out that the Supreme Court denied a hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal in the case of Wickstrom v. McGrath, 86 Cal. App. 651, 261 P. 326, and they state that the case last mentioned was one for unlawful detention of rented property, consisting of an apartment house; that a receiver was appointed; and that the plaintiff prevailed and that the damages awarded embraced the full amount of the rental unpaid at the time of judgment, together with interest thereon, and that in that case there was an abandonment of the premises and that this feature makes the citation applicable here. Assuming that in this case the acts of defendants evinced an intention to abandon the lease after the suit was instituted, and they had answered, still such an abandonment would not affect the question. If abandonment is accepted that would end the contract and the right to claim future rentals. In the case of Wickstrom v. McGrath, supra, judgment was rendered for the full amount of rental accruing up to the time of the trial, and the judgment recited nothing as to any credit that might result from the operation of the apartments by the receiver. But the opinion does not clearly disclose whether the receiver operated the property. It is at least clear that the point involved in this case was not raised. Any ruling in that case at variance with the case of Telegraph Avenue Corporation v. Raentsch, supra, is controlled by the latter case wherein the receiver appointed at the instance of the landlord did take possession of the leased premises, and wherein it was ruled that rental for the period of the receivership could not be awarded to plaintiff as damages.

[1-4] It is true that a lease may be so conditioned as that the landlord may, without seeking forfeiture, maintain an action for possession of the leased premises on account of a breach of the lease by the tenant. Brown v. Lane, 102 Cal. App. 350, 283 P. 78; Burke v. Norton, 42 Cal. App. 705, 184 P. 45; A. H. Busch Co. v. Strauss, 103 Cal. App. 647, 284 P. 966; Security Realty Co. v. Kost, 96 Cal. App. 626, 274 P. 608. But the point is that if a receiver is appointed at the instance of the plaintiff and the plaintiff prevails, the receiver is regarded as having held for the plaintiff. Moreover, the judgment here did not preserve the lease. The plaintiffs prayed for and obtained a judgment forfeiting the lease for acts done prior to the judgment. The judgment was predicated upon a notice to quit, served with a view to forfeiture, if the rent was not paid. The action in unlawful detainer is one for possession with the right to recover damages as an incident. Ordinarily the lease involved is forfeited. The right to the damages is limited to the amount of the rental, where failure to pay rent is the breach, the court having the power to treble the damages if the withholding is wilful. However, the effect of a chattel mortgage, in so far as it secures the payment of rental which is incorporated in the judgment for damages, is not destroyed. Ashcroft Estate Co. v. Nelson, 26 Cal. App. 400, 147 P. 101; Crittenden v. St. Hill, 34 Cal. App. 107, 166 P. 1016; Arnold v. Krigbaum, 169 Cal. 143, 146 P. 423, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 370. Plaintiffs did not elect to ask merely for a damage judgment. They claimed the premises were wrongfully withheld from them and that a receiver should be appointed, and they prayed for forfeiture of the lease. The legal effect of an adjudication that the premises were wrongfully withheld and that the lease should be forfeited was that if the receivership yielded amounts in excess of the stipulated rental this yield would go to the plaintiffs. This remedy, under the circumstances of this case, is, in the light of the law as declared by the Supreme Court, inconsistent with the right to claim damages during the possession of the receiver.

The receiver was appointed on July 17, 1930. The oral testimony indicates that he took possession on that day. But there is no finding that he did so. Finding 4 is merely that the receiver qualified on that day. Defendants were not to be found, and they were, through an agent, collecting rentals from subtenants. The court obviously considered that it was not necessary to receive evidence as to the exact time the receiver was able to receive full enjoyment of the entire premises. While under some circumstances a partial eviction may suspend the whole rent (36 Cor. Jur. p. 383), it may be inferred from the case of Telegraph Avenue Corporation v. Raentsch, supra, that the tenant may not in every case be entitled to avoid completely the rental obligation merely as the result of the appointment of a receiver who obtains but a partial possession. There was here extreme willingness in the defendants to escape the lease. Welcomed partial eviction is scarcely like ordinary partial eviction. If the evidence on a further trial should show that through subtenants, or otherwise, a part of the premises was withheld from the receiver, defendants should not be permitted to avoid entirely the use of the rental obligation as a basis for damages. Under a variety of circumstances, it may be just to apportion rental and reduce the rental obligation in proportion to deprivation of possession. 36 Cor. Jur. pp. 383, 380, 341. If plaintiffs prevail on a new trial, the moneys in the hands of the receiver will be treated as belonging to plaintiffs. Such moneys represent earnings of property taken in possession by a receiver appointed at plaintiffs' instance.

[5, 6] Where the tenant makes it obvious that the granting of the privilege to restore the lease by paying the damages awarded would be an idle act, it is not necessary that the judgment in unlawful detainer should accord that privilege. Telegraph Avenue Corporation v. Raentsch, supra. While the judgment could be affirmed as to a limited amount of damages conceded by defendants and forfeiture of the lease directed in accordance with the principles announced in the case cited, defendants coupled the concession of forfeiture with a prayer that the damages should be limited to $3,820. The court may, on a new trial, increase the damages or find wilfulness in withholding the premises. If the damages are increased, the privilege of the tenant to have the estate restored by paying the damages as mentioned in section 1174, Code of Civil Procedure, is required to be a part of the judgment.

Under the circumstances a complete reversal of the judgment is necessary, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. GUITEREZ.

Cr. 1220.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 29, 1932.

1. Criminal law ⇐419, 420(2).

Rule that person to whom child, too young to become competent witness, had made complaint concerning recent assault on her, may testify regarding fact that such complaint was made, does not authorize hearsay statement of circumstances concerning attack related by child.

2. Criminal law ⇐1036(1), 1044.

Exclusion of incompetent hearsay evidence held waived by failure to object thereto, or to move to strike it from record.

3. Criminal law ⇐681(1).

Permitting witness to testify that defendant admitted he was afflicted with gonorrhea without first proving that defendant's statement was voluntarily made held not error (Pen. Code § 288).

Admission of such testimony was not error, since the acknowledgment on part of defendant was not a confession of guilt under Pen. Code, § 288, of lewd and lascivious conduct toward a child, but was a mere admission of defendant's physical condition, which might tend to show a possibility of his guilt, and since the admission of a fact which does not itself involve criminal intent nor amount to confession of guilt may not be excluded from the evidence merely for lack of proof that it was voluntarily made.

4. Criminal law ⇐696(1).

Defendant seeking to exclude testimony regarding result of physical examination held to have burden of establishing that he was coerced into submitting to examination (Pen. Code, § 688).

5. Criminal law ⇐736(1).

Whether defendant, seeking to exclude testimony regarding result of physical examination, voluntarily submitted to examination, held for jury (Pen. Code, § 688).

6. Criminal law ⇐393(3).

Where defendant voluntarily submitted to physical examination, testimony regarding result thereof held admissible (Pen. Code, § 688).

7. Criminal law ⇐1186(4).

Failure of judge to sign charge given held not reversible error, where record fully disclosed exactly what transpired with respect to refusal or modification of instructions and charge which was actually given (Pen. Code, § 1127; Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Failure of the judge to sign his name to charge given, as required by Pen. Code, § 1127, was not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, since the instructions given, as well as those refused, were in writing, and were transcribed by the reporter and certified by the judge and there being no controversy regarding the exact language of the instructions given, or of those refused, and the purpose of section 1127 being to preserve for review an exact record of the charge which is given.

8. Criminal law ⇐829(17).

Refusing instruction regarding defendant's testimony held not error in view of further instructions.

Refusing requested instruction that jury should consider defendant's testimony same as that of any other witness, and fact that he was defendant should not prejudice his testimony in jurors' minds, was not error, where the court charged the jury that it was their duty to consider and weigh all the evidence in the case, and from such evidence to determine question of guilt or innocence of defendant, and further instructed that the weight which should be given to the testimony or the credit that jury should give to any of the witnesses in the case were peculiarly within the jury's province.

9. Infants ⊂⇒20.

Evidence supported conviction of lewd and lascivious conduct toward child (Pen. Code, § 288).

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; Stanley Murray, Judge.

Frank Guiterez was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct toward a child, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Barcroft & Barcroft, of Madera, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was convicted under section 288 of the Penal Code of lewd and lascivious conduct toward a child. On appeal it is contended the verdict is not supported by competent evidence; that the defendant was coerced to furnish evidence against himself by unwillingly submitting to a physical examination; that the prosecuting officer and the trial judge were guilty of prejudicial misconduct; and that the court erred in giving to the jury and in refusing to give certain instructions.

It is conceded the child, Julia Donati, who was but 5 years of age, was incompetent to testify as a witness. At the trial it was not possible to persuade her to answer questions. After a fruitless effort to induce her to speak, the court said: "Let the record show the court finds that the child is evidently nothing but a mere baby yet, * * * and does not respond to the court's questions. * * * She does not appear to understand what the proceedings are all about." Thereupon the child's mother was sworn and testified to circumstances which were related to her by the child constituting lewd and lascivious conduct on the part of the defendant. It is now contended this testimony of the mother is hearsay evidence and incompetent, and that no other substantial evidence supports the verdict.

[1, 2] It is conceded that the person to whom a child, who is too young to become a competent witness, has made complaint concerning a recent assault upon her, may testify regarding the fact that such complaint was made. People v. Ewing, 71 Cal. App. 138, 234 P. 917, 919. But this rule does not authorize the hearsay statement of circumstances concerning the attack which may have been related by the child. It is said in the Ewing Case, supra: "The rule does not extend to the details of the acts complained of." In the present case the statement which was related by the mother of the child does include circumstances and details which, under a proper objection, would be inadmissible. Harmful as this evidence may have been, we are satisfied from a careful examination of the transcript its exclusion was waived by failure to object to the evidence or move to strike it from the record. The controversy between counsel regarding the admission of evidence of this nature consumes several pages of the transcript. Objections to several questions which were propounded by the prosecuting officer were sustained, and testimony thus adduced was stricken from the record. Respective counsel and the court seem to have recognized the correct limitation of the rule as above stated. It is difficult to distinguish the exact dividing line between competent evidence of the complaint of an infant child regarding a recent assault and the incompetent details thereof. This led to numerous objections and several orders striking out evidence from the record. The only statement made by the mother regarding the complaint of the child which remains in the record, with the exception of the evidence which was brought out by the defendant on cross-examination, is in reply to the following question: "Go ahead and state, now, what she told you." No objection was offered to this question. A portion of the answer is competent under the rule above stated. The balance of this answer regarding certain details of the affair may be conceded to be incompetent. The incompetent portion of this answer was waived by failure to object to the question or move to strike it from the record. People v. Gasser, 34 Cal. App. 541, 168 P. 157.

[3] Error is assigned in permitting a witness to testify that the defendant admitted he was afflicted with gonorrhea, without first proving that the statement was voluntarily made. The alleged admission was material. It tends to corroborate the child's accusation that he was guilty of lewd conduct toward her. His acts resulted in communicating to her a venereal disease. The examination of a physician soon after the commission of the alleged acts disclosed the fact that the child was also afflicted with the same disease. The acknowledgment on the part of the defendant was not a confession of guilt. It was a mere admission of his physical condition which might tend to show the possibility of his guilt. The defendant both in court and out of court, asserted his innocence of the charge of lewd and lascivious conduct. This assignment of error is without merit.

It is the established rule that the admission of a fact which does not itself involve criminal intent, and which does not amount to a confession of guilt, may not be excluded from the evidence merely for lack of proof that it was voluntarily made. People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 354, 202 P. 51.

[4-6] It is asserted the defendant was compelled to become a witness against himself contrary to the provisions of section 688 of the Penal Code, by adducing evidence of the result of a physical examination which was alleged to have been conducted by a physician without the defendant's consent. This contention is without merit, for the reason that it satisfactorily appears the defendant voluntarily submitted to the examination. Independent of the examination, the defendant admitted he was afflicted with gonorrhea. He became a witness at the trial in his own behalf, and did not deny that he then suffered from that disease. It is true the defendant was taken by a peace officer to Dr. Stone, who asked him if he had ever had that particular disease. To this inquiry, the defendant replied: "I have got it now." The doctor then told him that he was charged with attacking a little girl and conveying to her the disease. He then asked the defendant: "Are you willing to submit to a physical examination?" The defendant replied: "I do not object to an examination at all." The physical examination followed, with the result that the defendant was found to be afflicted with "a bad case of organism, known as gonococcus." The defendant testified regarding this examination that the officer "took me up to Dr. Stone, and had me examined, * * * just told me I had to be examined, never asked me if I was willing." This raises a conflict as to whether the defendant voluntarily submitted to the examination. The burden was upon the defendant to show that he was coerced into submitting to the examination. The question as to whether he voluntarily submitted to the examination was a problem for the determination of the jury under proper instructions. Evidence of the result of a physical examination of an accused person may not be excluded in a criminal action on the ground that it compels him to become a witness against himself, where the examination is conducted with the consent of the accused. 16 C. J. 567, § 1099. From a careful reading of the record it satisfactorily appears that the defendant voluntarily submitted to a physical examination by the doctor. Independently of the examination, he also admitted he was afflicted with gonorrhea. The result of the physician's examination was therefore merely cumulative.

[7] Error is assigned by the appellant for failure to charge the jury from written instructions or to "indorse and sign" the instructions which were given, in the manner provided by section 1127 of the Penal Code.

The court requested respective counsel to stipulate that oral instructions might be given to the jury. After a colloquy on this subject, the attorney for the defendant said: "We will not stipulate." The court then said: "Let the record show that the court proceeds to read such instructions as seems necessary to give from a written manuscript which is before it." The court then proceeded to read to the jury elaborate instructions containing all the essential elements of the offense. At the request of the court, these instructions were transcribed by the court reporter and filed as a record in the case. This written charge which was given by the court was not signed by the judge. It is contained in the transcript on appeal, and is certified by the judge as the correct charge which was given to the jury. Twelve other proposed instructions were submitted in writing to the court by the defendant. Each of these additional instructions was signed and indorsed by the judge as refused on the ground that they were "covered by other instructions."

Section 1127, supra, provides in part: "All instructions given * * * shall be in writing, unless both parties request the giving of an oral instruction, or consent thereto, and when so given orally, all instructions must be taken down by the phonographic reporter. * * * Upon each charge presented and given or refused, the court must indorse and sign its decision."

The instructions which were given to the jury in the present case, as well as those which were refused, were in writing. They were transcribed by the reporter and certified by the judge. There is no controversy regarding the exact language of the instructions which were given and of those which were refused. The only requirement of section 1127, supra, which was not fulfilled, is that the judge failed to sign his name to the charge which was given. The purpose of the statute requiring all instructions to be in writing, and designating the portions thereof which are given, refused, or modified, is to preserve for review an exact record of the charge which is given. This was done in the present case. The accuracy of the record of the charge in this case is just as certain as though every paragraph of the written manuscript from which the judge read had been separately signed by the judge. While the preserving of an accurate record in writing of all instructions given by the court and refused is required by the statute and is mandatory, unless both parties consent to the giving of oral instructions, we are of the opinion the mere omission of the judge's signature is not reversible error, provided the record fully discloses exactly what transpired with respect to the refusal or modification of instructions and the charge which was actually given. The defendant was not prejudiced by the omission of the judge's signature or the procedure which occurred with respect to the court's charge.

The failure of the judge to sign his name to the written charge which was given in this case is a mere harmless error in procedure which is covered by the provisions of article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, which provides in part: "No judgment shall be set aside * * * for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

We are satisfied there was no miscarriage of justice in the present case.

[8] The appellant charges error in the refusal of the court to give to the jury the following proposed instruction: "The defendant has offered himself as a witness in this case in his own behalf. You are instructed that he has the legal right so to do and that you shall consider his evidence the same as that of any other witness brought before you. The mere fact that he is the defendant in the action should not prejudice his testimony in your minds, but you should weigh the same in the same manner as you weigh the testimony of the other witnesses who have testified in this case."

The refusal of this instruction did not constitute error. The essential portions of this proposed instruction were included in the general charge of the court which was given to the jury. The court charged the jury that: "It is the duty of each of you to consider and weigh all the evidence in the case, and from such evidence to determine, if you can, the question of guilt or innocence of the defendant."

The court also instructed the jury as follows: "The weight that should be given to the testimony, or the credit that you shall give to any of the witnesses in the case * * * are peculiarly within your province, which you, as jurors, under your oaths, must determine for yourselves."

It is held improper to give an instruction which singles out a particular witness to enhance or detract from the weight of his testimony or the credibility to which he is entitled. Where the substance of a rejected instruction is covered by others which are given to the jury, the defendant may not complain. People v. Brown, 71 Cal. App. 181, 235 P. 72. In the case of People v. Gordon, 78 Cal. App. 167, 248 P. 289, it was held the defendant was not prejudiced by the refusal to give an instruction to the effect that he had a right to become a witness in his own behalf and that his testimony should not be discredited merely because he was the defendant, since the jury was elsewhere correctly instructed generally regarding the weight of evidence and the credibility of witnesses.

The instruction respecting the statement of the child, Julia Donati, appears to be a correct declaration of the law. It is as favorable to the defendant as he was entitled to. It contains a warning against the "extreme liability of a child to repeat what she had heard." This instruction was not prejudicial to the defendant.

Nor do we think there was prejudicial misconduct in the rulings of the court or the conduct of the prosecuting officer which are assigned by the appellant as erroneous. These assignments are too numerous and involved to merit detailed discussion.

[9] We fully realize the danger of convicting a man who is accused of lewd conduct toward an infant child upon her uncorroborated statement, particularly when the child is too young to become a competent witness, and her evidence is adduced from the story which she relates to her mother. Upon the contrary, we also realize the futility of the law which would afford no protection to an infant child under such unfortunate circumstances. In the present case the statement of the child which was related by the mother is supported by certain corroborating circumstances. The defendant was 21 years of age. He lived with his mother and stepfather near the Donati home in Madera for about a year. Julia Donati frequently visited the Guiterez home and associated with the defendant. The defendant also visited in the Donati home. He was afflicted with gonorrhea. Within about a week after the child complained to her mother about his lewd conduct toward her, it was discovered the child was also afflicted with the same venereal disease. A reputable medical expert witness testified that nearly 99 per cent. of those individuals who are afflicted with this loathsome disease incur it through sexual communication. These circumstances furnish ample evidence to support the judgment. There does not appear to have been a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

NORTH HOLLYWOOD MORTGAGE CO. v. HENSHEY et al.

Civ. 4566.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

In corporation's action to have title to realty cleared from mortgages in favor of person dominating corporation for whose assets plaintiff corporation while under same control issued its stock, complaint held to state cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter S. Gates, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the North Hollywood Mortgage Company against Howard B. Henshey and others. From judgment dismissing plaintiff's second amended complaint on demurrer, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Wheeler & Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Baillie, Turner & Lake and Howard B. Henshey, in pro. per., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER, delivered the opinion of the court.

The respondents' demurrers to plaintiff's second amended complaint were sustained without leave to amend, and thereafter the action was dismissed by the trial court of its own motion. The cause is here upon the plaintiff's appeal.

[1, 2] The complaint sets forth eleven causes of action, and, if any one of the causes of action set forth contains sufficient facts to require an order overruling respondents' demurrers thereto, the judgment must be reversed. With this in view we will set forth herein in regular order all the allegations constituting the seventh cause of action, which in effect prays for a judgment quieting title to the lands and premises now owned by the plaintiff. The several causes of action set forth in the complaint detail the issuance of stock, the sale of stock, and the transfer of stock in violation of the order of the corporation commissioner of the state of California. That these violations may have taken place prior to the plaintiff having acquired title to the premises now owned by it does not estop the plaintiff from maintaining its action to quiet title if the mortgages hereinafter referred to were executed without consideration.

On the part of the appellant it is argued that the plaintiff was not a party to the unlawful issue and transfer of stock. On the part of the respondents, it is claimed that the plaintiff corporation necessarily participated in the unlawful issue of stock. However, it does appear from the complaint that, if the plaintiff corporation did participate in the unlawful issue and transfer of stock, the participation was at a time when the defendant B. F. Tatem was the president and manager of the plaintiff corporation, and the plaintiff corporation did not derive any pecuniary benefit therefrom.

It is also contended by the respondents that, whatever profit the defendant B. F. Tatem derived from the stock, issues, and transfers, it was at a time when he was the president of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and that whatever moneys B. F. Tatem unlawfully acquired were taken from the assets of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and not from any property belonging to the plaintiff corporation.

On the part of the plaintiff it is contended further that the North Hollywood Mortgage Company, a corporation, is but a continuation of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and that the money so unlawfully obtained by B. F. Tatem really belongs to the plaintiff in this action.

If it be assumed that the plaintiff corporation is a separate and distinct corporation, and not a continuation of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, as contended for by the respondents, the right of the plaintiff to have its title to the lands described in the complaint quieted as against fictitious mortgages is in no wise affected, as the illegal stock transfers do not trench upon or limit such right.

That the seventh cause of action set forth in the plaintiff's complaint may clearly appear, we set forth herein in chronological order all of the complaint which by appropriate references is included within said cause of action, to wit: The complaint first alleges the corporate character of the plaintiff, and then that the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, on or about the 11th day of June, 1924, with an authorized capitalization of 50,000 shares of the par value of $10 per share, of which 20,000 shares were preferred and 30,000 shares were common; that thereafter the authorized capitalization was increased to 250,000 shares of the par value of $10 per share, 120,000 shares of which were preferred and 130,000 shares were common stock. The corporate character of the defendant Citizens' National Trust & Savings Bank is then alleged, and also the corporate character of the Virginia Investment Corporation. The complaint next alleges that B. F. Tatem was the president and director and general manager of the B. F. Tatem Corporation, and that he drew a salary therefrom as such manager.

It further appears from the complaint that on or about the 28th day of December, 1928, the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation was regularly dissolved. It is then alleged that the plaintiff was incorporated on or about the 18th day of July, 1927; that the defendant B. F. Tatem was one of the incorporators, and was a director of the corporation, down to and including April 27, 1929; that the defendant B. F. Tatem was the president of the plaintiff corporation from the date of its incorporation down to and including May 23, 1928, and was the manager of the corporation during all of said period. The complaint further alleges that, during the time B. F. Tatem was the manager of the plaintiff corporation, he received a salary of $500 per month, and that during said time a contract, in form, was entered into between the plaintiff and the said B. F. Tatem, by which B. F. Tatem was to receive an additional compensation of 35 per cent. of the selling price of certain lands belonging to the plaintiff. It is then set forth in the complaint that, while B. F. Tatem was the manager of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, he caused the books and records of said corporation to be destroyed in order to prevent the plaintiff from acquiring information as to the acts of said corporation and B. F. Tatem as the manager thereof. The complaint then sets forth that the property of the North Hollywood Mortgage Company is property acquired from the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and that upon this property B. F. Tatem claims to hold two mortgages, one in the sum of $40,000 and the other in the sum of $80,000, as set forth in paragraphs contained in the fifth cause of action (which we will set forth in full hereafter). It is further alleged that under the plan in pursuance of which the North Hollywood Mortgage Company was organized, and the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation dissolved, the said B. F. Tatem being manager of both of said corporations at the time, was that units of stock of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation were to be exchanged for a like number of shares of the North Hollywood Mortgage Company, the stock of the North Hollywood Mortgage Company to be distributed among the holders of stock of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and then the transaction to be completed by the transfer of all the assets of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation to the North Hollywood Mortgage Company, and that the said defendant B. F. Tatem was appointed to make the transfer of stock, as just set forth.

The complaint then sets forth a description of all and singular the real estate claimed to belong to the plaintiff, and for which it asks that its title be quieted, and then by appropriate references makes the following allegations a part of the seventh cause of action:

"That while said defendant was president and director of the plaintiff corporation he, as president of said corporation, executed in the name of said corporation a trust deed for the principal sum of eighty thousand dollars ($80,000.00), in which J. T. McElhaney was named as beneficiary and the North American Bond & Mortgage Company, a corporation, was named as trustee. That the said trust deed was made to secure the payment of a note in the principal sum of eighty thousand dollars ($80,000.00), the same bearing date on or about the 16th day of January, 1929, and bearing interest at the rate of seven (7) per cent per annum, payable quarterly from the 31st day of March, 1929, and said note being payable on or before one year after date. That as a matter of fact the said named beneficiary had no financial interest whatever in the said note or trust deed and advanced no part of any money and gave no consideration whatever for the said note and trust deed, as plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be. Plaintiff is further informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said note and trust deed were executed for the benefit of said defendant B. F. Tatem. That said defendant B. F. Tatem claims to own said note and all moneys accruing thereunder. That plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said defendant Tatem gave no consideration whatever for said note; and plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said defendant B. F. Tatem did not give a consideration in the sum of eighty thousand dollars ($80,000.00) for said note or any consideration whatever. That said trust deed is recorded in book 8956, at page 273, of official records in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, California. That the property described in said trust deed as security for the payment of said note is the same property as that described in paragraph III of the third cause of action herein, which has by reference (been) embodied in this fifth cause of action. That no part of said note has been paid but there is still unpaid the principal sum of eighty thousand dollars ($80,000.00).

"That while said defendant was president and director of the plaintiff corporation he, as president of said corporation, executed in the name of said corporation a trust deed for the principal sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00), in which Howard B. Henshey was named as beneficiary and the North American Bond and Mortgage Company, a corporation, was named as trustee. That the said trust deed was made to secure the payment of a note in the principal sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00), the same bearing date on or about the 9th day of February, 1928, and bearing interest at the rate of seven (7) per cent per annum, payable quarterly, and said note being payable on or before one year after date. That as a matter of fact the said named beneficiary had no financial interest whatever in the said note or trust deed and advanced no part of any money and gave no consideration whatever for the said note and trust deed, as plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be. Plaintiff is further informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said note and trust deed were executed solely for the benefit of said defendant B. F. Tatem. That said defendant B. F. Tatem claims to own said note and all moneys accruing thereunder. That plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said defendant Tatem gave no consideration whatever for said note; and plaintiff is informed and believes and alleges the fact to be that the said defendant B. F. Tatem did not give a consideration in the sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00) for said note or any consideration whatever. That said trust deed is recorded in book 8383, page 153, of official records in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, California. That the property described in said trust deed as security for the payment of said note is the same property as that described in paragraph III of the third cause of action herein, which has been by reference embodied in this fifth cause of action. That no part of said note has been paid but there is still unpaid the principal sum of forty thousand dollars ($40,000.00)."

These allegations are followed by the setting forth of a claim on the part of the plaintiff that it is the owner of all and singular the real estate to which we have referred, that the defendants named in this action, and each of them, claim an interest in the property adverse to the plaintiff, that the claims of the defendants, and each of them, are without right, validity, or foundation whatever, and that the defendants, nor any of them, have any right, title, or interest in and to said property adverse to the title of the plaintiff herein.

The transcript shows, as we have stated, that the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation was in existence from the 11th day of June, 1924, until April 27, 1929, and that the plaintiff corporation has been in existence since the 18th day of July 1927. It thus appears that the two corporations were in existence at the same time for nearly two years, and that the transactions involving the acquiring of money on the part of B. F. Tatem by the issuance and transfer of stock affected only the rights and interests of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation and its stockholders. There is nothing in the complaint, nor in any of the several causes of action set forth, which shows that the plaintiff in this action has acquired any right or interest in and to the recovery of any of the moneys secured by B. F. Tatem, if it be assumed that those moneys were wrongfully obtained from the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, and this is true, even though it be assumed that the plaintiff corporation is but a continuation of the B. F. Tatem Finance Corporation, because, so far as the complaint is concerned, it only shows that, at the time of the transfer of the units of stock of one corporation for units of stock in the other corporation, there was then transferred to the plaintiff the real estate set forth in the complaint and referred to in this opinion. This, however, does not limit the right of the plaintiff in so far as it may be entitled to a decree of the court holding that the mortgages or trust deeds held by the defendant B. F. Tatem are illegal and void and should be removed as a cloud upon plaintiff's title.

[3] We do not need to follow the arguments of respondents wherein it is claimed that the record upon this appeal is insufficient to enable this court to pass upon its merits. What we have said sufficiently shows that the record does contain all that is necessary for this court to consider in determining whether the seventh cause of action contains sufficient facts to entitle the plaintiff to a trial. If the respondents had desired a more complete record, they might have brought the same to the attention of this court by suggesting a diminution thereof. The original complaint was not brought up upon this appeal as part of the record, but, if the amended complaint sets forth sufficient facts, consideration of the original complaint becomes wholly immaterial. And this is doubly true by reason of the fact that we are confining what we have said strictly to the seventh cause of action, being of the opinion that the other causes of action set forth in the complaint are insufficient, without going through them in detail. What we have said in relation to the seventh cause of action shows practically all that is set forth in the other causes of action, and from which it appears that the demurrers to the other causes of action were properly sustained.

[4] Being of the opinion that the demurrers to the seventh cause of action were improperly sustained, it follows that the judgment of dismissal should be reversed. And it is so ordered, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrers as to the seventh cause of action, permitting the respondents to file answers thereto within such time as the court may deem just, if so advised.

Ex parte HUSON.

Cr. No. 1232.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 4, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 19, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 3, 1932.

1. Criminal law ⇐980(2).

It was unnecessary to fix degree of crime of attempted robbery before pronouncing sentence; such crime not being segregated into degrees (Pen. Code, §§ 211a, 664, 1192).

2. Criminal law ⇐980(2).

Defendant's attorney's admission that defendant was armed when he attempted robbery justified court in finding defendant guilty of attempted robbery of the first degree (Pen. Code, §§ 211a, 664, 1192).

Pen. Code, § 664, prescribes punishment for attempt to commit robbery. Section 1192 provides court shall, on plea of guilty of crime divided into degrees, determine degree before passing sentence, and section 211a provides that robbery by one armed with deadly weapon is robbery in the first degree.

Application by Louis Morgan Huson for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the Warden of San Quentin State Prison to secure petitioner's release.

Writ denied.

Louis Morgan Huson, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

Upon petition for a writ of habeas corpus, the petitioner contends he is entitled to his discharge from custody for the reason that the judgment of commitment is void for failure on the part of the court to determine the degree of his crime before pronouncing sentence.

The information which was filed against the defendant contained four counts. The second count charged him with an attempt to commit robbery. On June 6, 1928, the defendant appeared in court with his attorney and entered a plea of guilty of the offense charged in the second count. The other counts were thereupon dismissed. At that time the defendant waived time for pronouncing sentence, and the following proceedings occurred:

"The Court: * * * You have heretofore been duly and legally arraigned. * * * You have entered a plea of guilty to count II and you have waived time for the pronouncement of judgment, and your counsel stated you have no just cause or legal reason to show why judgment should not be pronounced against you. Have you anything to say to the court * * * before judgment is pronounced?

"Defendant Huson: No, sir. * * *

"The Court: Mr. Louis Morgan Huson, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that you be sentenced to be committed to the state prison of the State of California at San Quentin, for the term prescribed by law. * * *

"Mr. Hill (attorney for defendant): As to counts I, III and IV, may we have an order. * * *

"The Court: Just a minute gentlemen. What about the degree? We didn't fix that.

"Mr. Lippold (district attorney): It is an attempted robbery, your honor. I don't know that there is a degree but there was a deadly weapon used, so if there is any degree it would be first degree attempted robbery.

"The Court: That is your understanding?

"Mr. Hill: Yes, if your honor please. The defendant informs me there were no bullets in the gun, but under the latest decision of the Supreme Court it would still constitute a deadly weapon.

"The Court: Very well. The court will find that this is attempted robbery in the first degree."

[1] It is unnecessary to fix the degree of the crime of attempted robbery. The penalty for an attempt to commit robbery is the same whether the offense be that of robbery of the first or the second degree. The penalty is the same whether robbery is committed with or without the use of a deadly weapon. People v. Arguero, 113 Cal. App.

424, 298 P. 520. section 664 of the Penal Code provides in part:

"Every person who attempts to commit any crime, but fails, or is prevented or intercepted in the perpetration thereof, is punishable, where no provision is made by law for the punishment of such attempts, as follows:

"1. * * * If the crime attempted is murder, robbery, burglary in the first degree or lewd and lascivious conduct the person guilty of such attempt shall be punishable by imprisonment in the state prison for a term of not more than twenty years."

Evidently the Legislature deliberately refrained from distinguishing between robbery of the first and robbery of the second degree, in fixing the penalty for an attempt to commit this offense. In the section last mentioned, a distinction was made between burglary of the first and second degrees. But an attempt to commit robbery is punishable by the same penalty, regardless of the nature of the circumstances attending such attempt. It is necessary for the court or a jury to fix the degree of a crime only for the purpose of determining the penalty which may be lawfully imposed. The statutes of California establish no degrees of the crime of attempted robbery.

[2] Even though the crime of attempted robbery were segregated into degrees, the record in this case sufficiently complies with the provisions of the statute. Section 1192 of the Penal Code, upon which the petitioner relies, reads: "Upon a plea of guilty of a crime distinguished or divided into degrees, the court must, before passing sentence, determine the degree."

Under the provisions of section 211a of the Penal Code, robbery which is perpetrated by one who is armed with a deadly weapon is robbery of the first degree. During the imposing of sentence, the defendant's attorney admitted that the accused was armed with a deadly weapon at the time of the attempted robbery. This admission is sufficient evidence of the fact upon which the court was justified in finding that he was guilty of attempted robbery of the first degree. People v. Paraskevopolis, 42 Cal. App. 325, 183 P. 585, 587. In the case last cited, the court says regarding the sufficiency of such evidence: "We think a voluntary statement or plea by the accused would be sufficient to uphold the determination by the court of the degree."

Upon this admission of defendant's attorney that the accused was possessed of a deadly weapon at the time of the attempted robbery, the court said: "Very well, the court will find that this is an attempted robbery in the first degree."

In spite of the fact that the court determined the degree of the crime immediately after he pronounced the formal language which committed him to state prison for the term prescribed by law, it is apparent the fixing of the degree of the crime was an inseparable part of the same proceeding of pronouncing sentence. The judgment of commitment which was issued on the same day the sentence was pronounced contains the following language:

"Whereas the said Louis Morgan Huson having duly pleaded guilty in this court of the crime of attempted robbery, a felony, as charged in count 2 of the information, which the court finds to be attempted robbery of the first degree,

"It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said Louis Morgan Huson be punished by imprisonment in the state prison of the State of California at San Quentin for the term prescribed by law."

For the reasons that the California statutes provide for no degree of an attempt to commit robbery so far as the penalty is concerned, and because the record adequately conforms to the provisions of section 1192 of the Penal Code, even though it were necessary to fix the degree of the attempt to commit robbery, the judgment is valid.

The writ of habeas corpus is denied.

HASWELL v. COSTELLENOS et al.

Civ. 7933.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 28, 1932.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Oct. 28, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

Limitation of actions ⇨100(8).

Three-year statute did not begin to run against right of action on realty broker's bond until discovery of fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subds. 1, 4; St. 1923, p. 96, § 9a).

The complaint alleged that defendant licensed broker, while acting as plaintiff's agent, persuaded her to buy certain realty at price of $2,500, fraudulently concealing fact that it was held for sale at $1,000, and that such agent, through aid of another defendant, cheated plaintiff out of the difference. The action being founded on fraud, cause of action on broker's bond furnished under St. 1923, p. 96, § 9a, did not accrue until plaintiff discovered fraud, under rule that surety's liability is measured by that of principal, and where, owing to concealed fraud of latter, statute has not commenced to run, surety cannot invoke protection of statute on ground that he was innocent of fraud.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Charles W. Haswell, as executor of the last will of Luiggia Beffa, substituted for Luiggia Beffa, deceased, against Constantine G. Costellenos, Nicholas J. Preovolos, and the Continental Casualty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant first named, but denying judgment as against defendant last named as surety on broker's bond, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, in pro. per.

Redman, Alexander & Bacon, and Herbert Chamberlin, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANDERSON, Justice pro tem.

The trial of this case was by a jury. While the appellant complains of a nonsuit as to certain counts of the complaint, there was a judgment, general in its terms, entered in favor of defendant surety company upon a directed verdict. The notice of appeal is directed exclusively to this judgment. In fact, the clerk's transcript shows no entry of an order or judgment of nonsuit. After the appeal was taken, the original plaintiff, Luiggia Beffa, died, and the present plaintiff, the executor, was substituted. The word "plaintiff" will refer to the original plaintiff.

The appeal is upon a typewritten transcript. The entire record is 343 pages in length. From the briefs, it appears that the sole question involved is the question of statutory construction hereinafter stated. Therefore the court has not undertaken a close examination of the record represented by the reporter's transcript and which is 300 pages in length. On a few pages the nature of the case has been stated by the appellant's counsel, and, excepting for a few minor corrections, respondent's counsel has concurred in this statement. The action is one for fraud practiced by defendant Costellenos, a licensed real estate broker. The respondent surety company was joined in the action. It had bonded the broker under the provisions of section 9a of the Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1923, p. 96). The bond was given to cover the broker's liabilities incurred in the year 1926. The plaintiff prevailed against Costellenos, the principal named in the bond. The act referred to has been repeatedly amended as shown in Smithson v. Sparber (Cal. App.) 11 P.(2d) 90. Costellenos took no appeal.

The first count of the complaint charged that the said Costellenos, while acting as the plaintiff's agent, persuaded her to buy a piece of real property at a price of $2,500, fraudulently concealing the fact that it was held for sale at $1,000, that the agent, through the aid of defendant Preovolos, cheated plaintiff out of the difference of $1,500. The second and third counts charge frauds of the same character, except that Preovolos was not a party. In each of these the loss alleged was $300. During the progress of the trial, the plaintiff was permitted to add a fourth count to the complaint. This count duplicated the first count, and added nothing to the complaint. In view of the conclusions arrived at, consideration of the fourth count becomes immaterial.

The record contains the original complaint. It was filed on July 31, 1929. Appellant's opening brief recites that the transactions sued upon in the complaint occurred between May 7, 1926, and June 4, 1926. Respondent's brief does not challenge this statement nor the statement that evidence was offered tending to show that the plaintiff did not discover the frauds complained of until a point of time in the year 1927, which was less than three years prior to the commencement of the action.

As above indicated, the verdict and judgment went against the broker for $2,100, the amount claimed in the three counts.

Respondent's defense, which was sustained by the trial court, and which was the ground for the directed verdict in favor of the respondent surety company, was pleaded by way of amendment made at the trial. The defense was that each of plaintiff's causes of action was barred by subdivision 1 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure; that the liability involved is a liability created by statute; that in such case the cause of action accrues when the fraud is practiced and not when it is discovered. It is argued that the bond was a statutory bond. It is urged: "The statute created both the right of the plaintiff against the surety and the correlative liability of the surety to the plaintiff. Without the statute neither the right nor the correlative liability would have existed." The appellant claims that the action is for fraud, and that under subdivision 4 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure the cause of action accrued only upon discovery of the fraud, and that the complaint was filed within three years from discovery; that the surety became liable equally with the principal. It is the settled rule in this state that, where a public official fails to perform his official duty, and the wrong complained of is fraudulent in its nature, subdivision 1 of section 338 fixes three years as the limitation for the commencement of an action on account of the resulting damages; that the statute begins to run when the wrongful act is committed and not when discovery occurs. The cases have dealt with the bond of a county recorder (County of Sonoma v. Hall, 132 Cal. 589, 62 P. 257, 312, 65 P. 12, 459); a notary public (Norton v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 176 Cal. 212, 168 P. 16); a receiver (United B. & T. Co. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., 204 Cal. 460, 268 P. 907). In the case of Norton v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., supra, the Supreme Court referred to the contention that the conduct of the notary in affixing his false certificate of acknowledgment to a mortgage and in concealing that fact was a fraud. The notary, to avoid discovery of the fraud, paid various amounts due upon the mortgage. The trial court's decision was in favor of the plaintiff. It ruled the case was a fraud case, and that, as to the surety, the statute ran only from discovery. But the Supreme Court reversed the case. It said, first referring to an earlier case (County of Sonoma v. Hall, supra): "It was sought to apply the statute of limitations relating to promises in writing founded upon a specialty or any agreement, contract, or promise, but the court held that the proper law for that purpose was the one prescribing the period within which actions against officers for nonfeasance and misfeasance in office might be commenced, the court saying, among other things: 'So far as actions of this character are concerned, the limitation acts upon the cause, not the form of action. And the effect of the statute cannot be evaded by any change of the form of action.' In the later case of County of Calaveras v. Poe, 167 Cal. 519, 140 P. 23, this court approved County of Sonoma v. Hall, holding that a cause of action for violation by a public officer of his statutory duty is governed by subdivision 1 of section 338, Code of Civil Procedure, as to the time within which it must be commenced. It is not necessary, therefore, to consider what statute of limitations might apply to an action against Dreischmeyer on account of his fraud and his breach of duty as attorney and agent, in carrying out a general rascally scheme of which the false acknowledgment was but a part. Sureties are never held beyond the strict terms of their agreements, and it would seem illogical to bind this defendant, not only for the violation by Dreischmeyer of his official duty, but for other and subsequent frauds against which it did not promise to indemnify persons doing business with the notary public, and without which the plaintiff must have discovered the illegal nature of the forged acknowledgment." (Italics ours.) Norton v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., supra, pages 214, 215 of 176 Cal., 168 P. 16, 17.

The same rule was applied in Hellwig v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 39 Cal. App. 422, 179 P. 222, and in Peterson v. Title Guaranty & Surety Co., 35 Cal. App. 103, 169 P. 239. The remarks of the Supreme Court mean that, if official misconduct is an essential part of the facts causing the injury complained of, the case against the surety is not to be regarded as a fraud action, because of any misrepresentation or concealment involved. The Supreme Court used the word "statutory." It was not speaking of a private fiduciary. And, with one exception —a receiver—the cases cited have dealt with acts of strictly public officers. The Supreme Court has not ruled that, where fraudulent conduct is the basis of the cause of action and the nature of the office—a position of trust towards the party complaining—imposes on the officer a duty to refrain from concealment, the statute of limitations against the wrong runs from the time the wrong is committed. Seemingly without exception, the cases show that fraud of a fiduciary is entitled to no other name than that of fraud and to no other protection than the statute of limitations applying to concealed fraud. A real estate agent contracts to protect his employer. Confidence is imposed, and he acts in a fiduciary capacity and owes an affirmative duty of disclosure. This is elementary. Duff v. Duff, 71 Cal. 513, at page 532, 12 P. 570; Allsopp v. Joshua Hendy Machine Works, 5 Cal. App. 228, 90 P. 39. To bond the agent is to bond against breach of the duty referred to. The case of United B. & T. Co. v. Fidelity & Deposit Co., supra, dealt with a receiver's bond, and held that the rule of the cases first cited above applies to such a bond. While a receiver's powers and duties are not directly prescribed by statute, they are dependent upon the court's order of appointment. Code Civ. Proc. § 568.

As has been frequently declared, property held by a receiver is held in custody of the law. His position resembles that of a public officer, whose duties are to a great extent expressly prescribed by statute. Many of a fiduciary's obligations do not depend upon statutory enactment, even in those cases where he acts by court appointment. When an administrator of an estate commits a fraud, the liability which arises is not treated as a liability created by statute. The statute of limitations begins to run from the discovery of the fraud. In the litigation represented by the two decisions in the case next cited, the final decision being by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, it was ruled that subdivision 4 of section 4054 of the Revised Codes of Idaho, which section reads the same as section 338 of our Code of Civil Procedure, applies to the fraudulent conduct of an administrator of an estate. Discovery of the fraud occurred many years after the wrong was committed. The administrator's surety was made a party and made subject to the same ruling. Diamond v. Connolly (C. C. A.) 276 F. 87, at page 90; Diamond v. Connolly (C. C. A.) 251 F. 234, at page 241. Our Supreme Court denied a hearing in the case next cited. Fraud had occurred in the rendition of a guardian's accounts. The guardian was held liable for the fraud of the attorney whom the guardian employed. The court said: "The defendants claimed the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The very gist of the action is the alleged fraud of the defendants. The plaintiff was not bound to make outside inquiries, but was entitled to rely on the assumption that the defendants would treat him fairly. He was not bound to commence an action until he discovered facts showing that he had been treated otherwise. He commenced his action within one year after making the discovery of the alleged shortages. His action was commenced in time." Gaver v. Early, 58 Cal. App. 725, at page 730, 209 P. 390, 392. Where an executor or an administrator practices fraud upon a beneficiary of an estate, or where a guardian cheats and defrauds his ward, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until the discovery of the fraud. Powell v. Overton, 191 Iowa, 574, 181 N. W. 24; In re Anderson, 97 Wash. 688, 167 P. 71; Sunter v. Sunter, 190 Mass. 449, 77 N. E. 497; Lewis v. Welch, 47 Minn. 193, 48 N. W. 608, 49 N. W. 665; Morris v. Johnstone, 172 Ga. 598, 158 S. E. 308; Arrington v. McDaniel (Tex. Civ. App.) 4 S. W.(2d) 262; Rosenberg v. Rosenberg, 141 Wash. 86, 250 P. 947. Where a fiduciary commits a fraud and does not reveal it, the statute runs only from discovery or from the time of having means of knowledge. Levy v. Ryland, 32 Nev. 460, 109 P. 905; Irwin v. Holbrook, 26 Wash. 89, 66 P. 116; Vigus v. O'Bannon, 118 Ill. 334, 8 N. E. 778; Dumbadze v. Lignante, 244 N. Y. 1, 154 N. E. 645. And, as our Supreme Court has noted, where the duty is strictly official and statutory, and it is fraudulently performed, the statute of limitations, in some states, runs only from the time of the discovery, the surety being held along with the principal. Morrissey v. Carter, 103 Okl. 36, 229 P. 510; State of Missouri ex rel. Meinholtz v. American Surety Co. (Mo. App.) 254 S. W. 561; Skagit County v. American Bonding Co., 59 Wash. 1, 109 P. 197; Allen v. State, 6 Kan. App. 915, 51 P. 572.

Counsel for respondent points to the case of Blumenthal v. Larson, 79 Cal. App. 726, 251 P. 241. The case dealt with the liability of a surety on a bond which was given under section 5 of the Corporate Securities Act, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 90), and which guaranteed compliance by defendant Larson with the law while acting as a licensed broker under said act. The court held that the bond covered only breaches of the specified requirements of the Corporate Securities Act, such as the selling of securities when no permit had been issued. But the Corporate Securities Act was amended and the scope of the bond required was widened so as to include a case of ordinary fraudulent conduct of the broker. St. 1925, p. 967. It is now held that the "right of a party to sue a broker for actual fraud in the sale of securities is clearly recognized by the provisions of the act." Hogberg v. Landfield, 99 Cal. App. 360, at page 364, 278 P. 907, 909. The surety was held liable along with the principal.

The cases dealing with the Real Estate Brokers' Act make it obvious that its purpose was to regulate real estate brokerage business and give persons employing real estate agents protection. It has been repeatedly ruled that the bond given by the broker protects the employer against the fraudulent conduct of the broker and his employees. Dodge v. National Surety Co., 110 Cal. App. 618, 620, 294 P. 741. The employees are not deputies. They are not officials. The following late case quotes from an earlier case: "In the case of Dodge v. National Surety Co., 110 Cal. App. 618, 620, 294 P. 741, the precise point was passed upon. There it was said: 'It is argued that the Surety Company cannot be held liable for fraudulent acts of the brokers' employees because the bond ran to the brokers alone. The point is without merit.'" Smithson v. Sparber, supra, at page 92 of 11 P.(2d). The case last cited shows the care with which the act has been amended. If the object and purpose of the statute were to prevent fraud and to allow a recovery for fraud of a real estate agent, it is inconceivable that the act would be construed so as to permit the surety of a real estate agent who was sufficiently shrewd and clever to conceal his fraud for a period of three years to escape liability. This would simply put a premium upon high-class fraud. The general rule is that "a surety's liability is measured by that of his principal and where, owing to the concealed fraud of the latter, the statute has not commenced to run, the surety will not be permitted to invoke the protection of the statute on the ground that he was innocent of the fraud." 17 R. C. L. p. 866.

For the reasons stated, it is our conclusion that the trial court erred in ruling that the statute of limitations had run against the liability of the defendant insurance company and accordingly directing a verdict in its favor. The judgment in favor of said company based on said verdict is therefore reversed, with directions to re-enter the same in favor of said plaintiff and against said company for the amount of the principal sum specified in the bond.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, Walter K. Tuller, and Homer I. Mitchell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

Mr. Presiding Justice PRESTON, delivered the opinion of the court.

A rehearing of this cause was granted for the purpose of giving further consideration to some of the contentions of appellants.

After a careful review of the case, we are satisfied that our original opinion is correct, and it is hereby adopted as the opinion of this court, to wit:

The Security-First National Bank of Los Angeles, having succeeded to all the rights and authority of the Los Angeles Trust & Savings Bank and the Pacific-Southwest Trust & Savings Bank, was substituted as plaintiff in this action.

Plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mortgage or deed of trust executed by defendant J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., to secure $300,000 in bonds.

Plaintiff was named as trustee in said instrument, and judgment was rendered in its favor as said trustee for the sum of $466,580.97, foreclosing the said mortgage and ordering the property described therein to be sold and the proceeds applied to the payment of said sum.

The judgment further provided that defendant Hunter, Dulin & Co. has a lien on said property, subject to plaintiff's mortgages, for $26,338.17, that defendant Carl E. Wagner has a lien on said property, subject to the lien of plaintiff and to the lien of Hunter, Dulin & Co., for $33,283.01; and that defendant T. H. Carlon has a lien on said property, subject to the lien of plaintiff and the liens of Hunter, Dulin & Co., and Wagner, for $29,163.55.

From this judgment defendants Ruddle Properties, Inc., Carlon, Lemas, Pareira, Bettencourt, Silva, Petta, and Wagner have appealed.

This mortgage or deed of trust was given to secure the payment of bonds to the amount of $300,000, 275 of said bonds being of the denomination of $1,000 each and 50 of said bonds being of the denomination of $500 each.

*For subsequent opinion see 23 P.2d 1016.

Permit from the Corporation Commission was obtained for the sale of said bonds amounting to the sum of $225,000, but no permit was secured for the sale of the bonds amounting to the sum of $75,000.

The court found that all of said bonds were sold by appellant J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., to bona fide purchasers for value in good faith, before maturity, without notice of any defect or infirmity in said bonds, or any of them. The Hunter, Dulin Company acted as agents for J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., in negotiating the sale of said bonds.

The principal contention of appellants is that the mortgage or deed of trust was altered, in material respects, after its execution, without the knowledge or consent of appellant Ruddle Properties, Inc.

Allan Ruddle, a witness for appellants, testified that he was the vice president of Ruddle Properties, Inc., at the time the mortgage or deed of trust was executed. The original mortgage or deed of trust, together with a copy, was handed to witness by Hugh Landram, the attorney for Ruddle Properties, Inc. He took them home, and the next day, August 10, 1922, he, his father, since deceased, and his brother, Garland Ruddle, then secretary of said company, carefully read the said documents and that the two documents were identical. Witness testified that there were pencil alterations in both the original instruments and in the copy, and that the alterations were the same in each; that he retained possession of said documents until August 14, 1922, when he and his father and brother went to Merced, and in the office of their attorney, Landram, the original was signed and acknowledged; that at that time the pencil interlineations were still on the original after its execution; that Phil Brooks, the agent of Hunter, Dulin & Co., came to the home of witness on August 15, 1922, and brought the bonds which were signed by his father and brother and were delivered to said Brooks together with the mortgage or deed of trust; that Brooks said that, when he got back to Los Angeles, he would write in ink the pencil notations contained in the original; this witness also testified that there was a good deal of hurry and rush among the attorneys in order to get the papers in shape for the bond issue; that all papers regarding this matter were prepared in Los Angeles and sent up from there. The testimony of Garland Ruddle on behalf of appellants was substantially the same as that of Allan Ruddle.

An examination of the copy of the mortgage or deed of trust returned by Allan Ruddle, and which appellants introduced in evidence as their Exhibit No. 7, shows about thirty interlineations in pencil, whereas the original mortgage or deed of trust executed on August 14, 1922, shows none (being Plaintiff's Exhibit 1).

H. K. Landram, a witness for respondent, testified that he was the attorney who represented J. G. Ruddle Properties, Inc., in the matter of their bond issue of $300,000; that the deed of trust securing same was executed in his office in Merced and in his presence, and was acknowledged before him as a notary public; that the said instrument did not when so executed contain any pencil notations, nor did it have any of the pencil notations that appear on Appellants' Exhibit No. 7. He stated on cross-examination that he could not say whether or not he read the deed of trust over before it was executed. He had been instructed by Mr. North of the firm of Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher to be extremely careful that everything was done just right, and, while he could not say that the deed of trust produced in evidence by respondent was in the identical condition that the instrument was in when it was executed and acknowledged in his presence, he reiterated the statement that there was no pencil writing on that instrument at the time it was executed. R. L. North, a witness for respondent, testified that he was an attorney, and was associated with Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher of Los Angeles; that he had charge of legal matters connected with the bond issue of Ruddle Properties, Inc., and that he prepared the trust deed and other documents pertaining to the bond issue; that Landram was the attorney for said company, and that witness sent him the various documents relating to the transaction; that he sent Landram the deed of trust that was executed by the Ruddle Properties, Inc.; that Appellants' Exhibit No. 7 was an early draft of the proposed deed of trust; but that the deed of trust that he sent Landram for execution by the Ruddle Company was a completed instrument, and that the deed of trust is now in the same form it was when it was sent to Landram for execution; that the only writing with pen and ink that appears on the deed of trust is the filling in of certain dates which were placed there by witness before he sent it to Landram for execution; that a copy of this instrument was sent to the corporation commissioner a few days after its execution.

An inspection of Respondent's Exhibit No. 1, which is the deed of trust executed by the Ruddle Company, shows no pencil marks nor writings with pen and ink except the aforesaid dates.

One of the changes which appellant claims to have been made after its execution was that the deed of trust covers after-acquired property. On August 4, 1922, and again on August 11th following, resolutions were passed by the board of directors of the Ruddle Company authorizing the insertion of this clause in the deed of trust, and these resolutions were prepared by North.

Allan Ruddle testified that he discovered that changes had been made in the deed of trust in 1928; that at the last-named date he found a letter written by Brooks to Landram dated August 17, 1922, in which Brooks requested Landram to send his copy of the trust deed to him in order that he might substitute corrected pages which were made in the original, and that, upon such substitution being made, he would return it to Landram for his files. Landram made no reply to this letter. He further testified that he had a certified copy of this deed of trust made in 1924 for the purpose of securing a loan or for use in selling some of said stock.

[1, 2] The trial court found that the mortgage or deed of trust was not altered in any respect after its execution on August 14, 1924. We are of the opinion that this finding is supported by substantial evidence, and, such being the case, this finding is binding upon this court.

[3] Appellants next contend that the bonds amounting to $75,000 having been issued without the permission of the corporation commissioner are void. Supporting this contention he cites section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act of Statutes of 1917, p. 679, which provides "every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void."

The $75,000 worth of bonds for which no permit was issued were all issued and sold by appellant Ruddle Company in 1923 and 1924 for value. None of them matured until 1926. While there is no direct evidence that the holders of these bonds took them without notice that a permit for their issuance had not been given by the corporation commissioner, yet the inference is that they took them in the usual course of trade without such notice.

In the case of Goodale v. Thorn, 199 Cal. 307, 249 P. 11, 12, the court said: "Upon proof by the defendant of fraud or illegality in the inception of the note, the burden is cast upon the indorsee to show that he is an innocent holder. This the latter may do by showing that he purchased the note before maturity, or from an innocent indorsee for value, in the usual course of business. When this is done, unless the evidence shows that the note was taken by the plaintiff under circumstances creating the presumption that he knew the facts impeaching its validity, the burden is cast upon the defendant to show, if he would defeat the plaintiff in his action, that the latter took the instrument with notice of the defendant's equities. Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 P. 873. To the same effect are the cases of Sinkler v. Siljan, 136 Cal. 356, 68 P. 1024; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410, 78 P. 957 [104 Am. St. Rep. 61]; Blochman Commercial Bank v. Moretti, 177 Cal. 256, 170 P. 419."

The trustee in this case, the respondent, is merely a nominal party in this action; the real parties in interest are the owners and holders of the bonds. In the recent case of Eberhard v. Pacific Southwest Loan & Mortgage Corporation (Cal. Sup.) 9 P.(2d) 302, 303, after stating that there was nothing whatever to show that plaintiffs were anything more than innocent victims of appellant, which was now seeking to profit by its own deliberate wrong, the court said: "The inhibitions of the Corporate Securities Act * * * against sales of securities to the public without permits are meant to protect the public from imposition and deception—not primarily to benefit the seller. The seller and the purchaser are therefore in no sense in pari delicto where this provision is violated. The fact that the transaction may be void at the behest of the purchaser is not to allow a premium for real wrong done by the seller. The fundamental maxim that 'no one can take advantage of his own wrong' (section 3517, Civ. Code), and other kindred principles, immediately recur to the mind. The above is but a recast of the doctrine abundantly supported by authority and applied in cases involving this very act done under similar circumstances. See Pollak v. Staunton, 210 Cal. 656, 293 P. 26; Michell v. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co., 206 Cal. 609, 275 P. 418; Tatterson v. Kehrlein, 88 Cal. App. 34, 263 P. 285, and Castle v. Acme Ice Cream Co., 101 Cal. App. 94, 281 P. 396; Hemmeon v. Amalgamated, etc., Co., 95 Cal. App. 400, 273 P. 74."

[4] So in the instant case, there is no showing made that the bondholders are other than innocent victims of appellant, Ruddle Company, which is now seeking to profit by its own wrong.

We are therefore of the opinion that, under these circumstances, the defense that no permit was given to sell these bonds cannot avail appellants.

[5] Appellants claim that the court erred in ordering the property described in the deed of trust to be sold in one parcel, as an entirety.

Where the parties have contracted that the property shall be sold in one parcel, the court, in ordering the sale, shall proceed in accordance with the contract. In Humboldt Savings Bank v. McCleverty, 161 Cal. 285, at page 289, 119 P. 82, 84, the court said: "We do not doubt that the parties to a mortgage or a deed of trust may contract that the premises shall be sold as a whole, and that their agreement to this end is enforceable." See Bank of Sonoma County v. Charles, 86 Cal. 322, 24 P. 1019.

In the instant case, the deed of trust provided that, under a judgment or decree of foreclosure, the whole of the property should be sold in one parcel, and as an entirety, unless such sale as an entirety is impracticable by reason of some statute or other cause.

The only evidence produced by either of the parties upon this matter was that of Allan Ruddle. He testified that 1,800 acres of the premises were in the river bottom and were divided into six units of dairies, each having a barn and dairy equipment, and each leased and operated by different persons; that 1,900 acres of upland were divided into 400 acres of vineyards, 600 acres in peach trees, and about 700 acres of pasture land, the remaining consisting of 300 or 400 acres lying under the canal; that he had some experience in selling land in the neighborhood; and that, if this property be sold as a whole, it would not realize 50 per cent. of its value.

It is manifest that the court was authorized to order the sale of the premises in one parcel, unless such sale in one parcel would be impracticable by reason of some statute or other cause. In Humboldt Savings Bank v. McCleverty, supra, the court held that section 694 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to a mortgage which provided that the premises be sold in one parcel.

4 Words and Phrases, First Series, 3443, defines the word "impracticable" as incapable of being effected from lack of adequate means, impossible of performance, not feasible. Practically the same definition is given in 31 Corpus Juris, 259. Webster's New International Dictionary defines "feasible" as follows: (1) Capable of being done, executed or effected, practicable; (2) fit to be used, dealt with successfully, suitable; (3) likely, probable, reasonable.

Appellants Ruddle Company and Wagner allege in their answers that the sale of the whole of said property in one parcel would be impracticable, for the reason that no purchaser could be found who would bid the market value of said property, and that it could not be sold as a whole for a sum approximating its value; that, if offered for sale in parcels and so sold, the proceeds realized therefrom would be in excess of the amount owing on the bonds.

Supporting these allegations is the testimony of Allan Ruddle which appears to have been received without objection. This testimony shows that the mortgaged property is not devoted to a single line of production, but included the growing of grapes and peaches and the operation of dairies. Under these conditions, it would appear that the practicable way of disposing of this large body of land so as to realize anything like its market value would be to segregate it into units. By this segregation purchasers who desired to purchase only the dairies would be given the opportunity of bidding for dairies, while those who desired the land planted to grapes or to peaches would be afforded the opportunity of bidding for these.

Appellants claim that the court erred in overruling their demurrers to the complaint. While they have failed to point out in their briefs the grounds upon which they rely to sustain this claim, we are of the opinion that it is without merit.

[6] They also claim that the trustee should have seen that the money realized from the sale of the $75,000 bonds was applied to the improvement of the mortgaged land. An examination of the deed of trust fails to show that the trustee was required to do this.

[7] Appellants also contend that the court had no authority to determine the priorities of the defendants' alleged liens among themselves, nor any authority to make the nunc pro tunc order, striking out of the judgment the clause entitling appellants Hunter, Dulin & Co., Wagner, and Carlon to have their said liens foreclosed.

In Rowley v. Davis, 169 Cal. 678, 147 P. 958, the court held that the conflicting claims of the defendants between themselves, in which the plaintiff was not interested, should be postponed for determination.

In the instant case, the pleadings showed no contest of appellants between themselves as to their liens or to the priorities thereof with respect to each other, consequently there was no issue raised that gave the court the right to pass upon their liens, or priorities of same, as between themselves. Such being the case, the matters involved in the appeal from the nunc pro tunc order are not necessary to be discussed by reason of the modification of the judgment hereinafter made.

The judgment is modified by striking out paragraphs III, IV, V, and VI of the judgment relating to the liens of Hunter, Dulin & Co., Carl T. Wagner, and T. H. Carlon; the judgment is further modified by striking out that part thereof requiring said mortgaged premises to be sold in one parcel and as an entirety and substituting for the part of said judgment so stricken the following words: "The property shall be segregated and sold in separate parcels or units"; the trial court to take evidence for the purpose of ascertaining into how many parcels or units said mortgaged property should be divided, and upon such hearing to divide said property into the parcels or units that appear from said evidence to be best adapted to produce the most advantageous sales of same, and thereupon to order said property to be so sold.

The judgment, as so modified, is affirmed; neither appellants nor respondent to recover costs on this appeal.

Mr. Presiding Justice PRESTON delivered the opinion of the court.

The appellant was charged jointly with Allen Curts with the crime of grand theft, consisting of the stealing of three sets of harness, seven horse collars, seven halters, several bridles, one saddle, one saddle blanket, trappings, and a pair of schaps, of a total value in excess of $200, belonging to W. H. Flournoy. The defendant Curts admitted his participation in the crime. The appellant was separately tried and found guilty of grand theft. The accomplice, Allen Curts, was the chief witness against him. From the judgment of conviction the defendant has appealed.

The appellant contends the evidence fails to support the verdict for the reason that there is a lack of corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice, and because the only evidence that the value of the stolen property exceeds the sum of $200 was furnished by the owner, Flournoy, who failed to qualify himself as a witness regarding the valuation on account of a lack of knowledge of recent sales of secondhand property of that nature.

[1] The owner of personal property who is familiar with its original cost and use is qualified to testify regarding its value, independently of his knowledge of recent sales of similar secondhand property. 1 Wigmore on Evidence 813, § 716; Hood v. Bekins Van & Storage Co., 178 Cal. 151, 172 P. 594; Klind v. Valley County Bank, 69 Mont. 386, 222 P. 439; Vukmanovich v. State Assurance Co., 82 Mont. 52, 264 P. 933; Third Dec. Dig. "Evidence," ⇐ 474 (19).

[2-5] The text of Wigmore on Evidence, above cited, reads as follows: "The owner of an article, whether he is generally familiar with such values or not, ought certainly to be allowed to estimate its worth." The primary question of the qualification of a witness to express an opinion regarding the value of property rests chiefly upon the sound discretion of the trial judge, exercised according to well-established rules of evidence. Except for an abuse of this discretion, the admission of such evidence will not be disturbed on appeal. The weight of the evidence must be determined solely by the jury.

In the present case Mr. Flournoy testified that he was the owner of the stolen property and knew the approximate value thereof, although he had not known of recent sales of such secondhand property in that vicinity. He said: "Any farmer has * * * some idea of the value of harness and other property on the ranch, or he would not be able to do business." He testified that the saddle cost him $104, but fixed its value at $75. He estimated the aggregate value of the stolen articles at $240. This does not seem unreasonable. A harness maker of Alturas, who examined most of the stolen articles, estimated their aggregate value at slightly less than $200. He thought the saddle was worth only about $50. The testimony of Flournoy regarding the value of the stolen property was competent to be considered by the jury. The question of the actual value of the property was a problem for the determination of the jury. The jury found the appellant guilty of grand theft. By implication, we must assume, the jury thought the stolen property worth in excess of $200. The evidence is ample to support this finding.

[6] The record contains sufficient corroboration of the testimony of Allen Curts to support the verdict. The defendants had been associates for two years. Both were interested in horses. They had participated in rodeos. Mr. Flournoy was engaged in stock raising in Modoc county. The appellant was working for Harry Hughes, a neighbor of Allen Curts, his codefendant. He had been employed as a farm hand for about a month, and was sleeping in the granary. Within a few days after the theft occurred, the appellant was found with one of the stolen bridles and the saddle in his possession on the Hughes place where he was employed. When Mr. Flournoy and an officer arrived at the Hughes ranch in search of the stolen property, they were refused permission to examine the premises without a search warrant. Flournoy remained there while the officer procured a warrant. Both the saddle and the bridle were found. There was no previous claim of ownership or explanation of their presence. When they were discovered, the appellant said: "They didn't have nothing on him because that was his bridle." He then claimed it was his own bridle. Prior to the discovery of the saddle and bridle, the appellant negotiated with one Blodgett to trade the stolen saddle for another one. Blodgett testified to this fact. Mr. Hughes also testified that the appellant arranged with him to exchange one of the sets of stolen harness for another set. He said: "Mr. Haney said we (Curts and himself) have got one set of leather tug harness that you might as well take out there, because we want to plow, and we would like to have chain harness when we plow." These and other circumstances which are disclosed by the record corroborate the testimony of the appellant's accomplice in the theft sufficiently to support the verdict against him.

[7, 8] The corroborating evidence which is required by section 1111 of the Penal Code to supplement the testimony of an accomplice need not be sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant independently of the testimony of the accomplice, nor furnish satisfactory evidence of all the essential elements of the crime. Such corroborating evidence is sufficient if it satisfactorily tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, even though its weight be slight and is entitled to little consideration when standing alone. GORDON v. GORDON et al. (JULIAN PETROLEUM CORPORATION et al., Interveners.)

Civ. 8151.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 6, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 5, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐1010(1).

Trial court's findings of fact made on substantial evidence are conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis P. Russill, Judge.

Action by Walter L. Gordon against Wilbur C. Gordon and another, wherein the Julian Petroleum Corporation and others intervened. From a judgment for interveners, defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

Charles S. Darden, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Anderson & Anderson and A. G. Ritter, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J.

In an action brought by plaintiff against the defendants, Julian Petroleum Corporation intervened.

As far as concerns the facts which are material to the question submitted to this court, it appears that the defendants were the owners of a beneficial interest in a trust; that, arising from some anticipated services to be thereafter performed for the defendants by one White, it was assumed that in payment thereof compensation would become due to White; that White was indebted to the Julian Petroleum Corporation in the sum of $2,290.97; and that the latter was insisting that White pay to it the said debt. Thereupon, with knowledge of the facts, the defendants and White signed and delivered to Julian Petroleum Corporation an instrument in writing, a copy of which being as follows: "You are hereby authorized and directed to pay to the Julian Petroleum Corporation, or its order, the sum of two thousand two hundred ninety dollars and ninety-seven cents ($2,290.97), plus seven per cent (7%) interest from July 1, 1925, out of the first money due to us, or either of us, from Trust No. P-101, or from any other source or sources, subject to your claim or claims, and to charge this order to our account or the account of either of us. This order is not given or received as a payment of the above indebtedness, nor does it in any way release us from the obligation to the Julian Petroleum Corporation until the above amount, plus interest, is fully paid."

Upon receipt of such instrument, the trustee delivered to Julian Petroleum Corporation an acknowledgment thereof in the following form, to wit: "This will acknowledge receipt from you of order by W. C. Gordon, Desdemona L. Gordon, and J. W. White, directing the payment to you of the sum of two thousand two hundred ninety dollars and ninety-seven cents ($2,290.97) plus seven per cent (7%) interest from July 1, 1925, out of the first money available to the said assignors through this trust. The order has been duly filed and should any funds become available as provided in the order, we shall be pleased to pay such funds to you in satisfaction thereof."

More than one year thereafter, and following the receipt by the trustee of funds in amount more than sufficient to pay the sum represented by the assignment in question, by an instrument in writing signed by the defendants, the trustee was "instructed to cancel" the assignment theretofore made in favor of Julian Petroleum Corporation. From a judgment rendered in favor of Julian Petroleum Corporation on said assignment, the defendants appeal to this court.

With reference to the several reasons urged by appellants as affording a sufficient basis for the reversal of the judgment, it is noted that, founded on substantial evidence, the trial court made findings of fact which in the main preclude this court from disturbing the conclusion in substance and effect that the order given by the defendants to Julian Petroleum Corporation was an irrevocable assignment which was accepted by both the latter corporation and the trustee; that it was not subject to any defenses or equities of the defendants as against White; that it was supported by a sufficient consideration; that it operated as a transfer of a substantial right from the defendants to Julian Petroleum Corporation; and that the cause of action was not barred by the statute of frauds, "for the alleged reason that said order was given as an accommodation to J. W. White, mentioned in said order, or for a debt or obligation due from said White to said Julian Petroleum Corporation, or required a special promise to answer for the debt of said White." Moreover, the opinion in the case of Barlow v. Lande, 26 Cal. App. 424, 147 P. 231, together with the authorities therein cited, in principle constitute a complete and final refutation of all but the last of the several points suggested by appellants as a reason why the judgment herein should be reversed, to wit, that the right of the Julian Petroleum Corporation to enforce the assignment was barred by the statute of frauds. No authorities are cited by appellants in support of the last-mentioned point; nor is the application of the principle of law to the facts herein apparent to this court.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed.

See, also, 116 Cal. App. 584, 3 P.(2d) 35.

Marshall Rutherford, of Oakland, for appellant.

John L. Reith, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff and her son, Donald L. Patch, were the owners in fee simple as tenants in common of certain real property in Berkeley,

Cal. On April 30, 1927, plaintiff executed a deed, conveying her interest therein to her son, who on the same day executed to her his note for $10,437.50 payable on demand. The note contained the following clause: "In consideration of the aforesaid indebtedness I hereby grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm to Janett D. Patch, her successors and assigns, all the equity which I may hereafter acquire in and to the furnishings, equipment and appurtenances of a certain proposed building to be erected upon the property described in a certain deed dated to-day from Janett D. Patch and George Patch, her husband, to Donald L. Patch, a single man; also I hereby grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm to Janett D. Patch, her successors and assigns, all the equity which I may hereafter acquire in and to all improvements placed upon the property aforementioned."

Plans for the construction of an apartment house on the property had already been prepared, and after the above transaction the building was erected thereon. In the course of its construction certain refrigerating apparatus, consisting of seventeen Kelvinators with central units, tubing and boxes, seventeen Rip Van Winkle beds, and 4 electric light fixtures, were installed therein. The beds and light fixtures were paid for by plaintiff's son when the same were installed, but the Kelvinators were purchased by him under a conditional sale contract, title remaining in the seller until payment of the price. The same were described therein as "17—08 Evaporator Coils and 1 No. 5543 D. B. Compressor, serial No. 68124." The price of these articles was subsequently paid by the buyer.

On November 10, 1927, after the completion of the building and the installation therein of the above-described articles, defendant loaned to said Donald L. Patch the sum of $50,000, and the same was secured by a deed of trust of the real property. Subsequently upon default in payment the property was sold pursuant to the provisions of the deed of trust and purchased by defendant. The evidence shows that the installed articles were pointed out to defendant's agent by plaintiff's daughter at the time the apartment was being appraised for the purpose of making the loan. The instrument under which plaintiff claims was not recorded, and it is admitted that no notice of her claim was given to defendant until after the same last mentioned. It was testified that the amount of the appraisement included the value of the above articles and that the same were considered as material to the security. After the sale plaintiff attempted to remove the articles but was prevented by defendant, whereupon the present action was commenced to recover the same or their value, with damages for their detention.

The trial court found plaintiff to be the owner and entitled to the possession of "17 metal boxes kept in that certain apartment building (being the building referred to above), said boxes being units of and part of certain kitchen cabinets installed in said building and which boxes were used as the iceboxes in connection with said Kelvinator system." It also found that "the 17 Kelvinators together with central unit and all tubing used in connection therewith; 14 Rip Van Winkle beds and 4 electric light chandeliers" were at all times fixtures and the property of defendant. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the possession of the metal boxes or their value, with damages for their detention.

Plaintiff has appealed, claiming that she should have been awarded possession of all the property sued for.

According to section 660 of the Civil Code, "A thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is * * * permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings; or permanently attached to what is thus permanent, as by means of cement, plaster, nails, bolts, or screws."

[1] It will be unnecessary to review the evidence, which is voluminous, further than to say that it appears that the Kelvinator system, beds, and electrical fixtures were permanently affixed to the building and became fixtures within the rules declared in the following cases: Oakland Bank of Savings v. California Pressed Brick Co., 183 Cal. 295, 191 P. 524; Breyfogle v. Tighe, 58 Cal. App. 301, 208 P. 1008. Moreover, the facts bring the case within the rule that, without regard to the validity of the contract as betwen plaintiff and her son, it could have no force or effect against a subsequent incumbrancer who became such in good faith and without notice of the contract, which was the case here. Dauch v. Ginsburg (Cal. Sup.) 6 P.(2d) 952. See, also, Bell v. Mortgage Guarantee Co., 109 Cal. App. 203, 292 P. 660, which involved the heating system and water plant in the same building.

[2] It is urged by the respondent corporation—which, however, has not appealed—that plaintiff was not entitled to recover any of the property. It claims that the ice boxes were a part of the refrigerating system. As to this it will be sufficient to say that they were not purchased as part of the system, and the evidence is conflicting as to whether they were necessarily so or affixed to the building. There was in this connection enough evidence to justify the court's conclusion to the contrary, and its finding cannot be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Josephine POHLE, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. BOLINAS BEACH REALTY COMPANY (a Corporation), Day's U-Drive Autos, Ltd., Edward J. Goldstein, John Doe, Richard Roe, and the Doe Company (a Corporation), Defendants; Day's U-Drive Autos, Ltd., Appellant.

Civ. 8516.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

Motion to dismiss appeal by defendant or to affirm judgment of the Superior Court of Marin County, Edward I. Butler, Judge, in an action for damages for personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident.

Henry Heidelberg and Robert G. Partridge, both of San Francisco (John R. Golden, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Daniel A. Ryan and Thomas O. Ryan, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff brought this action for damages on account of personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident, naming as defendants Bolinas Beach Realty Company, a corporation, Day's U-Drive Autos, Ltd., a corporation, Edward Goldstein, and several fictitious parties. At the time the action was tried Goldstein's time for answering the complaint had not expired, and consequently as to him the cause was not at issue. The jury returned two verdicts, one against Bolinas Beach Realty Company for the sum of $17,500, and the other in favor of the defendant Day's U-Drive Autos, Ltd. Judgment was entered accordingly. Eight days thereafter Goldstein filed his answer, and approximately a month later the trial court granted plaintiff's motion for a new trial as against the defendant Day's U-Drive Autos, Ltd. The latter appealed from the order made in that behalf, and soon after its opening brief was filed plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment upon the following grounds: (1) That the appeal was taken for the sole purpose of delay; (2) that none of the evidence is contained in the transcript on appeal; and (3) that appellant's brief does not conform to the requirements of section 3 of rule VIII of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal.

We find no merit in the first and third grounds urged; but the second ground presents a debatable question for the reason that the appeal was taken on a clerk's transcript alone, and it would seem that in the absence of a reporter's transcript or a bill of exceptions embodying part of the evidence, several of the essential factors upon which appellant bases its legal contention that the order appealed from should be reversed do not appear in the record upon which the appeal is taken.

However, respondent did not serve or file with her notice of motion, as required by the rules of the court (see rule XX), any memorandum of points and authorities, nor, as yet, has she filed any brief on the merits; and in view of the important legal problem presented by the motion we do not feel called upon to attempt its solution without the aid of some sort of a brief on the part of the party in whose behalf the motion is made. Obviously the point is one which may be urged in respondent's brief as ground for affirmance at the hearing of the appeal on the merits, as well as by motion.

Therefore the motion will be denied without prejudice to the right of respondent to follow such course if she so desires.

TEC-ART STUDIOS, INC., OF CALIFORNIA v. FASHION FEATURE STUDIOS, INC., Limited.

Civ. 8036.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 4, 1932.

Appeal and error ⇐1126.

Appeal by defendant, claiming fatal variance between supplemental complaint alleging two contracts and proof of one only, affirmed as presenting unsubstantial question (District Court of Appeals Rule 5, § 3).

The original complaint alleged and the answer admitted execution of both contracts, and the supplemental complaint was filed only for the purposes of including in the demand an additional amount accruing under the contract since the filing of the original complaint and substituting the correct name of corporate defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Thomas C. Gould, Judge.

Action by the Tec-Art Studios, Inc., of California, against the Fashion Feature Studios, Inc., Ltd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment.

Motion granted, and judgment affirmed.

Milton M. Cohen, John M. Bowen, and C. M. Booth, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Don Marlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J.

Comes now the respondent and moves to dismiss the appeal of defendant from the judgment in this action, or to affirm the judgment, on the ground that the appeal is taken for delay only, and on the further ground that the questions on which the decision of the cause depends are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument. The motion is presented under section 3 of rule V of the Rules of Practice in this court. The text of said section 3, with some general comments thereon, may be found in Dalton v. Los Angeles College of Chiropractic (Cal. App.) 13 P.(2d) 546. It is a rule which provides for the dismissal of an appeal or affirmance of the judgment when in the opinion of the court the record justifies such dismissal or affirmance upon either of the grounds above stated.

In appellant's brief it is said that the judgment was based on the supplemental complaint which was filed in lieu of the original complaint by leave of court during the progress of the trial; that the supplemental complaint alleges that the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff in a stated sum "by virtue of a certain contract and lease dated September 21, 1929, and June 7, 1930, respectively"; that therefore it became necessary for respondent to prove the execution by appellant of the two contracts and to prove the amount due and owing under each contract; that the only contract in evidence is the contract of June 7, 1930. The only points presented in support of the appeal are that there is a total failure of proof, and that there is a fatal variance between the proof and the allegations of the supplemental complaint.

But the record shows that the original complaint did allege the execution of both contracts. As to each contract it was alleged that there had become due from defendants a stated sum. The answer of appellant, properly construed, admitted the execution of the contracts, but denied that the amounts of indebtedness alleged in the complaint had accrued. This was further confirmed by the separate defense, wherein appellant alleged the execution of each of said contracts.

The complaint named as defendants, "Fashion Feature Studios, Inc., Limited" (appellant herein), and "Fashion Feature News, Inc.," and certain individual defendants. The supplemental complaint named appellant as a defendant, but omitted the individual defendants and substituted the name, "Fashion Feature Studios, Inc.," instead of "Fashion Feature News, Inc." It appears from the reporter's transcript, p. 55, that the supplemental complaint was filed for the purpose of including in the demand an additional amount which had accrued under the contracts during the interval of time since the filing of the original complaint, and also for the purpose of making the substitution of corrected name as above stated. Under the evidence the substitution of names was really not material. This is so, because the evidence shows that there were not two corporations, but there was one corporation only, and appellant is that corporation. The confusion of names arose out of the fact that in the contract of September 21, 1929, appellant was named "Fashion Feature News, Inc.," although the officer who executed it was appellant's president, Mr. Gibson. The supplementary agreement of June 7, 1930, shows, as the testimony of witnesses also shows, by entirely clear inference, that the contracts were contracts of appellant, and that in all probability the named codefendant does not exist.

The amount of the judgment was determined by means of a referee's report, prepared from the books and records of the parties, under a stipulation for such reference. There were no exceptions to the referee's report.

The motion is granted, and the judgment is affirmed.

PERI v. CULLEY.

Civ. 8631.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 5, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1932.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1932.

I. Damages ⇐132(3).

$14,000 verdict in favor of motorcycle officer for severe head and body injuries held not excessive.

Evidence disclosed that plaintiff sustained severe skull fracture, fractured collar bone, nine fractured ribs, several broken teeth, and muscular hip injury and shock; that he remained in hospital two months; that he was unable to return to work until over three months after accident; and that, although he made good recovery in so far as broken bones were concerned, injuries to eye and hearing, resulting from skull fracture, continued at time of trial, which was three years and four months after accident. Evidence showed that loss of hearing was progressing and possibly would result in total deafness in one ear, and that fractured skull might result in epilepsy, and plaintiff's expenditures for medical care exceeded $1,000.

2. Appeal and error ⇐714(5).

Appellate court is bound to confine consideration to record as certified in transcripts, and cannot consider instructions quoted from appendix to brief and not contained in record.

3. Appeal and error ⇐928(4).

On defendant's appeal, court must assume in support of judgment that instructions complained of were given at defendant's request, nothing to contrary appearing.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Andrew Peri against Lester D. Culley. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals, and plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal or affirm the judgment.

STURTEVANT, J.

In an action brought to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision, the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $14,000. The defendant appealed from the judgment and has brought up a typewritten transcript. Later he filed his brief. Thereafter the plaintiff filed in this court a notice of motion to dismiss or affirm. Subdivision 3, rule V, of the Supreme Court and District Courts of Appeal. The plaintiff asserts that the questions on which the appeal rests are so unsubstantial as not to need further argument.

[1] The first point made by the defendant is that a verdict in the sum of $14,000 was excessive as a matter of law. The point is not sustained by the record. The accident occurred December 21, 1928. The plaintiff was riding on a motorcycle, and the defendant was driving an automobile, and the two met in a head-on collision. The immediate injury to the plaintiff consisted of shock, pain, a fractured skull, a fractured collar bone, nine fractured ribs, several broken teeth, and a muscular injury to his hip. In an unconscious condition, the plaintiff was immediately taken to a hospital. He remained unconscious for three or four days. He was confined in the hospital two months and five days. During all of that time he suffered intense pain in his head, chest, and hip. He was not able to return to his duties as a police officer until April 1, 1929; however, at that time, he returned to work. The trial was had March 31, 1932, three years and four months after the accident. According to all of the medical experts, the plaintiff made a good recovery in so far as broken bones were concerned. However, the fractured skull consisted of a break extending along the left temple commencing with the hard portion of the skull in which the eye is located and extending back into the occipital suture. That injury was such as to injure the nerve extending to the eye and the nerve extending to the ear. Soon after the accident, the plaintiff commenced to suffer a loss of hearing and a twitching of the eye. At the time of the trial both symptoms still continued according to the witnesses produced by the plaintiff. All of the witnesses agreed that the plaintiff's hearing in his left ear was injured by the accident and that the loss of hearing was progressing and possibly would result in total deafness in that ear. The witnesses for the plaintiff also testified that the fractured skull might result in epilepsy. The plaintiff expended $1,041.55 for medical care and treatment in the hospital. It is manifest that this point may not be sustained.

[2, 3] The defendant makes one more point. He complains because the trial court gave two certain instructions to the jury. He quotes from the appendix to his brief. There are two complete answers. This court is bound to confine its consideration to the record as certified in the transcripts. Neither the clerk's transcript nor the reporter's transcript discloses that any instructions whatever were given. If we were permitted to use what is contained in the appendix to the defendant's brief, we could not go further. That brief shows that certain instructions were given. Whether they were given at the request of the plaintiff, or the request of the defendant, or of the court's own motion, does not appear. In support of the judgment we must assume that they were given at the request of the defendant. Furthermore, taking all of the instructions together, it clearly appears that the trial court committed no error.

The motion to affirm the judgment is granted, and it is ordered that the judgment be, and the same is, affirmed.

SHERWOOD v. JACKSON.

Civ. 8331.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 28, 1932.

1. Appeal and error ⇐1004(3).

Trial court's judgment as to whether verdict was excessive or was arrived at through improper influences will be accorded greatest deference.

2. Damages ⇐132(3).

$1,500 award for head wound, body bruises, and injury to general health held not excessive.

Record disclosed that defendant hurled a telephone instrument at plaintiff, striking her upon head and inflicting thereon deep wound over her right eye; that wound was through tissues to bone, and initial treatment required a number of stitches and further medication; that there was permanent scar of some magnitude; that there were bruises on other portions of plaintiff's body, resulting from defendant's effort to restrain plaintiff's immediate departure after the major assault; and that occurrence had detrimental effect upon plaintiff's nerves, heart, and general health.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1004(3).

After plaintiff's partial remission of damages upon court's order, verdict is reviewed as if returned in reduced amount.

4. Assault and battery ⇐40.

Evidence held to show severe and reckless assault and battery by defendant against plaintiff, justifying award of exemplary damages, and award of such damages, as reduced to $505, was not excessive.

5. Trial ⇐260(1).

Failure to give tendered instruction substantially incorporated in given instructions held not error.

6. Trial ⇐210(2).

Charging jury generally as to effect of jury's belief that any witness had sworn falsely in one part of testimony, instead of emphasizing possible application of legal principle involved to plaintiff, held proper (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 3).

Glensor, Clewe, Schofield & Van Dine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ATTERIDGE, Justice pro tem.

In this action to recover damages resultant from an assault and battery, the verdict of the jury was initially in favor of plaintiff and respondent as against defendant and appellant for $2,500 actual damages, together with an award of $1,000 punitive damages. Subsequently, on motion for a new trial and as a required condition precedent to the denial thereof, the trial court exacted of plaintiff a remission of $1,000 of the amount awarded as actual damages, as well as $495 of the sum assessed as punitive damages. Plaintiff having filed her consent thereto, judgment in her favor in the reduced amounts was duly entered, from which defendant prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The main contention advanced by appellant is that the award for damages is so excessive in amount as to indicate that the jury in making its assessment thereof were animated by passion and prejudice. But the question as to whether or not any given verdict for damages is excessive in amount or arrived at through improper influences is always one for the primary consideration of the trial court which heard the cause or supervised the deliberations of the jury returning it. When that tribunal has fairly exercised its discretion in approving, disapproving, or modifying a given award in the manner and in the light of the considerations enjoined upon it by law, an appellate court must of necessity accord the greatest deference to the deliberately formed judgment of the trial court. This is because of the obviously superior and unrestricted opportunity which the latter alone possesses of passing upon the weight and effect of evidence, as well as of observing or determining just what influences, proper or otherwise, may have operated upon the collective minds of the jury. With these considerations in view our Supreme Court has repeatedly announced as a rule of law the precise evidentiary situation which must always exist and be presented by the record, before an appellant court is warranted in reversing a judgment upon the present ground thus urged by the appellant, as follows: "Unless we (the reviewing court) are able to say that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court was so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as presented to us on appeal as to shock the sense of justice and raise at once a presumption that it was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption, rather than an honest and sober judgment, this court may not exercise the power of revision." Kelley v. Hodge Transp. System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76, 81; citing authority. (Parenthetical insertion ours.)

[2] The record in the instant appeal wholly fails to present a case falling within the requirements of the rule last above stated. The evidence adduced on behalf of plaintiff, and to which the jury by its verdict gave credence and the trial court its ratification, tends to establish that she was the victim of a severe and reckless assault which had been committed on her by defendant. At the time of the assault the parties had been engaged as partners in the ownership of a telephone service operated for the convenience of physicians and dentists in the receiving and dispatching of their telephone calls. It was located in a building in San Francisco devoted exclusively to the tenancies of professionals of the given character. In the late afternoon of August 20, 1929, while plaintiff was peacefully engaged in the discharge of duties incident to the nature of their business, defendant became incensed in the course of a telephone conversation being participated in by and between the two parties (in different rooms but upon connected lines of communication) with a prospective employee. Thereupon leaving his room, the first words he addressed to plaintiff upon entering her office were: "God damn your soul to hell." He then committed an initial assault by throwing the telephone directory of the San Francisco metropolitan area at her, which plaintiff succeeded in dodging. After some further expression of profane language (which, however, should have afforded an interval for cooling time) following his initial assault defendant seized a telephone instrument (to which was attached an accessory termed a "Hush-a-phone," and which doubtless tended to intensify the danger of injury to plaintiff), and hurled it at plaintiff, striking her upon the head and inflicting thereon a deep wound over her right eye. The wound was through the tissues to the bone, and its initial treatment required a number of stitches and further medication. It left a permanent scar of some magnitude.

There was additional testimony as to the detrimental effect of the occurrence upon plaintiff's nerves, heart, and general health, which the jury were entitled to weigh and consider in making its award, as well as further testimony as to bruises on other portions of her body, resultant not from the major battery, but from an effort of defendant to restrain her immediate departure after the assault.

In our opinion a judgment of $1,500 actual damages based upon these circumstances falls short of establishing the inference of passion and prejudice whose presence has been earlier herein shown to be an indispensable requisite in order to warrant interference on the part of an appellate court.

[3] In this connection it is pertinent to further observe that after remission in part upon order therefor by the trial court, a verdict is reviewed on appeal as if it had been returned in the first instance by the jury in the reduced amount. Lynch v. Southern Pac. Co., 24 Cal. App. 108, 140 P. 298; Smith v. Brown, 102 Cal. App. 477, 487, 283 P. 132.

[4] Appellant further claims that the evidence is insufficient to justify the award of punitive damages even in the reduced sum ordered by the trial court. But the evidence upon which (under familiar rules of appellate practice) we are required to assume that the verdict of the jury was based is ample to establish a willful and unprovoked assault and battery. Aside from the proven facts that appellant was the sole aggressor, physically a member of the stronger sex, and that the element of self-defense is entirely absent from the case, his deliberate intention to be and remain belligerent is established by his second return to the attack, culminating, as it did, in a severe battery, after his initial assault had failed only because of the agility of plaintiff. The propriety of an award of exemplary damages under such circumstances is well established. Bloomberg v. Laventhal, 179 Cal. 616, 620, 178 P. 496; Bundy v. Maginess, 76 Cal. 532, 18 P. 668.

The sum allowed by the trial court (after reduction of the jury's assessment in a larger amount) does not exceed that of a similar award approved on appeal under somewhat analogous circumstances in Seelye v. Harvey, 46 Cal. App. 448, 189 P. 311.

We therefore rule that appellant's above specified claim is without merit.

Appellant also made the useless and futile attempt of causing a juror to impeach his own verdict by a recital of extraneous matters alleged to have transpired in the jury room. None of the matters set forth in the said juror's affidavit related to the definitely limited grounds upon which alone a juror is permitted to impeach his verdict (such as averments by the affiant that it was arrived at by "a resort to the determination of chance"), and the only effect of appellant's presentation of such an affidavit to the trial court on motion for a new trial and to this court in his briefs has been to unnecessarily add to the labors of both through the vain interjection of a false quantity into the case. As to the futility of such affidavits in derogation of a juror's verdict, see Fererira v. Silvey, 38 Cal. App. 346, 357, 358, 176 P. 371; Siemsen v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 494, 66 P. 672; 20 California Jurisprudence, pp. 61, 62.

[5, 6] The learned trial judge fully and fairly instructed the jury upon all the issues of the case, and the claim of appellant that it erred in failing to give certain tendered instructions with respect to the duty and power of the jury in making its assessment of damages is without merit because all of the qualifications of the instructions referred to were substantially incorporated in the instructions elsewhere given by the court on the subject. Similarly a requested specific instruction relating to the effect of the belief of the jury if it found that "plaintiff had sworn falsely to a material allegation" was fully covered by the court's general instruction upon this subject in its broader application to all witnesses, in the event the jury should find any of them to have sworn falsely. The court merely gave the time-honored and approved instruction on this subject, which has for its basic doctrine subdivision 3 of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, which it will be observed refers to a "witness" rather than to a litigant. The trial court was eminently correct in charging the jury generally in this respect instead of specially singling out the plaintiff for an emphasized (possible) application of the legal principle involved.

The judgment is affirmed.

BROWER (STATE COMPENSATION INSURANCE FUND, Intervener) v. ARNSTEIN.

Civ. 8358.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 23, 1932.

1. Automobiles ⇐244(11).

Jury's implied finding that intersectional collision between defendant's automobile and plaintiff's motorcycle was result of defendant's negligence held sustained by evidence.

2. Automobiles ⇐146.

Motorist must keep proper lookout in anticipation of meeting persons at any point of street, keep machine under proper control, slow up, and if situation requires, must stop.

3. Damages ⇐132(8).

$1,680 award for permanent mutilation of right hand and pain, aside from damages for loss of wages, held not excessive.

Record disclosed that, as result of injuries, large finger of plaintiff's right hand had to be removed by amputation; that injuries to index finger required eight stitches, and it was left in such condition as to permit of but limited use thereof in future; that thumb was also left in weakened condition; that plaintiff was required to remain two weeks in hospital after accident; that amputation occurred another four weeks thereafter; and that injuries required further medication for additional period of three weeks; and evidence justified inference that plaintiff suffered considerable pain during all such time.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1004(1).

To warrant appellate court in setting aside jury's award for excessiveness, amount thereof, when compared with injury and damage, must produce in minds of court inference of passion and prejudice so great as to shock judicial sense of justice.

5. Appeal and error ⇐1170(9).

In action for automobile collision, court's failure directly to define legal principle embraced in term "proximate cause" held error, but not reversible under circumstances (Const. art. 6, § 4½).

Circumstances disclosed that effect of error was substantially mitigated by effect of defendant's very numerous and detailed instructions given by court, in which almost every conceivable element of the multitude of defensive principles of law open to and urged by him was specifically presented to jury.

ATTERIDGE, Justice pro tem.

Respondent, John Brower, as plaintiff in the court below, brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from the negligent operation by defendant of his automobile. The action was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $2,750. This award, however, is subject to a first lien in favor of the intervening plaintiff, State Compensation Insurance Fund, in the sum of $637.94, and some of the other elements entering therein will be further discussed in our consideration of appellant's claim that the same is excessive as a matter of law. After seasonable motion for a new trial had been denied, appellant took this appeal from the judgment.

The accident resulted from a collision between defendant's automobile and plaintiff's motorcycle in the intersection of Bush and Larkin streets in the city of San Francisco. Prior thereto plaintiff, proceeding northerly on Larkin street, had momentarily stopped and rested his motorcycle in obedience to a sign or marker at this point reading, "Stop—Arterial." At that time, according to his testimony, he observed defendant's automobile more than half a block away proceeding easterly on Bush toward Larkin street. Shortly thereafter and at a time when the intersection was itself clear, plaintiff again started his motorcycle and had proceeded, at a speed of between three and four miles per hour, more than halfway across the medial line of Bush street on Larkin, where he was then struck on the left side of his motorcycle, between the middle and rear thereof, by the left front bumper and fender of defendant's automobile. This low rate of speed is clearly and reasonably accounted for by the necessity of starting the motorcycle in low gear and the consequential slowness of what is colloquially termed its "pick-up."

[1] Appellant states as his major contention that "the record fails to establish a case of liability against the defendant." By this we assume that in effect he contends that the evidence is insufficient to establish that the injuries were sustained as a result of negligence on his part. However, as we view the record it was entirely sufficient in this respect, particularly so in view of the repeated inconsistencies and self-contradictory changes with which defendant's testimony is replete, together with his marked absence of memory upon significant evidentiary factors connected with the accident, and his pronounced disposition to avoid giving direct answers to pertinent questions. This course of conduct undoubtedly left the jury in considerable doubt as to the accuracy of his entire testimony.

In addition to the inference of negligence which the jury could reasonably derive from the evidentiary situation already described (that is to say, a situation from which the jury could fairly find that the plaintiff, after first observing the precautions of stopping and looking, was struck by defendant's car at a time and place where he, plaintiff, had a right to be, after he had lawfully entered and had already traversed the major distance of the intersection prior to defendant's entry therein), it was further entitled to find that the defendant was under the existing circumstances guilty of active negligence in failing to stop his car in time to avoid the collision—for amongst others of the defendant's above-referred to contradictory admissions, was the following:

"I was almost half way across the intersection (of Larkin street).

"Q. When you first saw the motorcycle? A. Yes, I was about half way.

"Q. Do you mean by that, the front of your automobile was about half way across? A. Yes." (Italics ours.)

And again: "Q. You only saw the motorcycle just a second before the impact, did you not? A. Just a second?"

It will be noted that the answer to the last question is in the form of a counter interrogation, but appellant, who undoubtedly clearly understood the question by reason of his verbatim repetition of its substance, made no attempt to disclaim either then or subsequently the inference therein contained, and in view of his definite admission that he had progressed almost halfway across the intersection before he ever saw plaintiff, it follows as a certainty from his admitted speed of fifteen to twenty miles an hour, that less than a bare second's interval elapsed between the moment he first saw plaintiff and his almost immediate collision with him thereafter.

[2] It is the settled law of this state that a driver of an automobile is "bound to anticipate that he may meet persons at any point of the street, and he must, in order to avoid a charge of negligence, keep a proper lookout for them and keep his machine under such control as will enable him to avoid a collision with another person using proper care and caution, and if the situation requires he must slow up and stop." (Italics ours.) Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 340, 208 P. 125, 127; Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 317, 237 P. 1066.

In view of these principles and under the evidence heretofore referred to, the jury could and by their verdict impliedly did, find defendant guilty of negligence in failing to see plaintiff and stop his car in time to avoid the accident.

In avoidance of the inference of negligence that arises from his said failure to see plaintiff in time to avoid colliding with him, defendant stresses upon the claimed circumstance that when plaintiff stopped at the "arterial stop" sign hereinbefore referred to, he took up a position near the curb of the sidewalk on his right and that another automobile intervened between his said position and defendant's approaching car on the left. Plaintiff, however, definitely testified that his position was somewhat in advance of said intervening car (so that he could be easily observed). The jury of course was well within its province in believing plaintiff's version of the situation and in rejecting the contrary inference which appellant thus sought to have them draw.

We therefore hold that there was sufficient evidence on the issue of negligence upon which the jury could properly predicate their verdict.

[3] Appellant also earnestly contends that the jury's verdict is excessive in the amount of damages awarded as a matter of law. The verdict, however, comes before this court sanctioned by the approving ratification of the trial court on motion for new trial where, as we observed from the record, similar considerations were elaborately urged and adversely determined by the trial judge. Reference is hereby made to the recent decision of the court in the case of Sherwood v. Jackson (Cal. App.) 14 P.(2d) 861, post, where the rule setting forth the limitations governing appellate courts in their consideration of claims of this character, as well as the weighty effect that must be accorded the trial court's approval of the jury's verdict, were both considered in such detail as to render further repetition thereof unnecessary herein. It is sufficient to say that the verdict now under review does not fall within the rule enunciated in Sherwood v. Jackson, supra. It was, as previously stated, for $2,750, of which the intervening plaintiff, State Compensation Insurance Fund, has already been allocated $637.94. The evidence shows that in the six months' period during which he was directly incapacitated from work as a result of his injuries, plaintiff proved a loss of over $400 in wages over and in excess of the amount allowed him from the State Compensation Insurance Fund. This leaves the net verdict for pain, suffering permanent injury, impaired future earning capacity, and permanent disfigurement at approximately $1,679.50.

Plaintiff's entire right hand was extensively mutilated as the result of his injuries. The large finger thereof was removed by amputation; injuries to the index finger required eight stitches and it was left in such condition as to permit of but a limited use thereof in the future; and the thumb was also left in a weakened condition. Plaintiff was required to remain two weeks in a hospital after the accident, the amputation occurred another four weeks thereafter, and the injuries required further medication for an additional period of three weeks. During all this time the jury could rightfully infer that plaintiff suffered some considerable pain. To illustrate:

"Q. Did any complications, so far as you know, set in that caused the amputation of that finger? A. The knuckle was removed down at the doctor's office.

"Q. What do you mean the knuckle was removed? * * * A. * * * He reached in with a pair of tweezers and pulled the knuckle out of the finger. As he did that the finger dropped off"—and the consequent amputation followed.

[4] The amount of the verdict thus complained of, when balanced and compared against the cumulated effect of the several elements of injury and damage above referred to, fails to produce in our minds that inference of passion and prejudice on the part of the jury which must always be present in such force as to shock the judicial sense of justice before an appellate court is warranted in setting aside the award of a jury, and so we hold that appellant's claim as to the alleged excessiveness of the verdict is without substantial merit.

[5] Appellant also urges various and sundry claims of error against instructions given and refused by the trial court. The most vigorously pressed of these claims relate to the alleged failure of certain so-called "formula" instructions to individually contain a recital of all the elements essential to recovery by plaintiff. If these instructions are by a process of dislocation from the general charge, so separated from each other as to then be viewed with overtechnical nicety, they would unquestionably be subject to the objections urged by appellant. But the very method of the giving of these so-called "formula" instructions indicates plainly that they were not intended to so operate or to have such effect. They were merely intended in the first instance to advise the jury how their verdict should go in the event the respective matters set forth in the pleadings were either established or failed of establishment one way or the other. In other words, the instructions were not intended to, nor did they purport to state the several elements essential to a verdict as such in detail, but, instead, those matters were made the subject of separate specific instructions; the court's intention being merely to supply by reference to the pleadings a statement as to how the verdict of the jury should go in the event plaintiff did or did not establish negligence as charged in his pleading, or in the event he did so establish such negligence, how in such event the verdict should then go if contributory negligence was or was not established. They were not "formula" instructions of the type condemned in Beyerle v. Clift, 59 Cal. App. 7, 9, 209 P. 1015, where the pleaded element of contributory negligence was entirely omitted from an instruction directing a verdict. However, the particular omission in the instructions upon which appellant places the most stress is their serious failure to at any time define or express in direct terms the principle of "proximate cause." This is indeed a most serious omission, and we are not unmindful that in reversing the case of Long v. Barbieri (Cal. App.) 7 P.(2d) 1082, 1087, because of certain instructions of a more obviously erroneous character, we indicated the added weight that had been given the errors in question because of the similar failure of the trial court to define "proximate cause," by declaring: "It should be further noted that the trial court omitted to give any instruction whatsoever defining 'proximate cause,' and the jury were thus left to their own varying conceptions, if any, as to what might constitute this always related and ever essential principle of the doctrines of negligence and contributory negligence."

It must therefore be conceded that in failing to directly define and present to the jury for their consideration, the legal principle embraced within the term "proximate cause" the trial court committed an error of no inconsiderable magnitude. Its effect, however, is substantially weakened and mitigated in the present case by and through the effect of the very numerous and detailed instructions given by the court at the request of defendant, in which almost every conceivable element of the multitude of defensive principles of law open to and urged by him were specifically presented to the jury. These directly set forth the many and numerous circumstances upon which, in the event their existence was established by the evidence, the verdict of the jury must be for defendant, or plaintiff could not recover; and among these in connection with the terms "negligence" or "negligent" the word "proximately" is frequently used.

The jury was also instructed: "* * * Where negligence is charged, it devolves upon the person charging it, if he would prevail as to that charge, to establish * * * it by a preponderance of evidence." (Italics ours.) The court also, and as a part of its general charge, repeatedly instructed the jury in the utmost detail upon numerous matters that would constitute contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and thus defeat recovery. At no time did the appellant now urging the error of its omission, tender to the court an instruction defining "proximate cause," or request that qualifying instructions to those of which he complains be given.

The cumulative effect of these considerations leads us to place our determination of the merits of appellant's contention (that the failure of these instructions to define "proximate cause" is reversible error) fairly within the scope of the expression of a similar determination arrived at by our Supreme Court in Wirthman v. Isenstein, 182 Cal. 108, 110, 111, 187 P. 12, 13, where it is declared: "* * * where, as here, the court instructs that, to entitle respondent to recover, appellants must be guilty of negligence 'as alleged in the complaint,' and that respondent himself must be blameless and free from any contributory negligence, it must have been made perfectly clear to the jury that a finding by them that appellants were guilty of the negligence so described, the respondent himself being blameless, would of necessity amount to a finding that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Weaver v. Carter, 28 Cal. App. 241, 152 P. 323. Furthermore, the court's instructions, so far as they went, correctly stated the law, and if appellants desired a qualifying instruction to the effect that, to entitle respondent to recover, appellants' negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury, it was incumbent upon their counsel to either ask the court to give such qualifying instruction, which it undoubtedly would have done, or have presented an instruction embodying it. Having failed to do either, appellants are in no position to complain of the instructions given. Weaver v. Carter, supra; Townsend v. Butterfield, 168 Cal. 564, 143 P. 760; O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43, 141 P. 809."

We have carefully considered all the other claims advanced by appellant with respect to alleged errors of omission or commission in the giving of instructions, and find them to be of a much less serious and inconsequential character, and taken singly and collectively they do not, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, present errors of such sufficient magnitude as would justify a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONREY, P. J.

On the 22d day of February, 1932, in the nighttime, while John J. Logan, a police officer, was lawfully attempting to arrest the defendant, the arrest was resisted by the defendant, who in making such resistance assaulted the officer and inflicted upon him severe injuries. That the offense was committed is an undisputed fact. But the defendant contended at the trial, and now contends, that he is not the man who was being arrested, is not the man who made the attack upon the officer, and in fact was not present at the time and place of commission of the offense.

The grounds of appeal upon which defendant relies are: That the evidence is insufficient to justify or sustain his conviction; and that the court erred in its ruling admitting in evidence People's Exhibit No. 5, which consisted of certain automobile tools.

[1] Appellant's claim that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict is entirely without merit. Officer Logan in his testimony positively identified the defendant, and this testimony is abundantly corroborated by other evidence.

[2] The automobile tools were not directly proved to have been tools belonging with the stolen car which other evidence tends to prove was being driven by the defendant at the time of the attempted arrest of defendant by Logan. The stolen automobile was found on the following day at Compton, near the home of defendant's brother, and the tools were found in the garage of said brother. The evidence shows that the tools were a kind commonly belonging with that kind of an automobile, but that was the extent of the identification. Although we think that the court erred in admitting in evidence the said exhibit, we are of the opinion that this error was not prejudicial to the defendant in any very appreciable degree. Even if the exhibit had been excluded, it is not probable that the jury would have arrived at any different verdict from that which was rendered. After reading the evidence, we are satisfied that a true and correct verdict was returned.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PARKER, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal entered after the general demurrer of defendants to the complaint of plaintiff had been sustained without leave to amend.

The nature of the claimed cause of action and the grounds of the appeal can be gathered from a detail of the complaint. After the preliminary allegations of incorporation and residence it is alleged:

That on or about June 25, 1929, the defendant Charles R. Warfel was appointed assignee for the benefit of creditors of Rye-Krax Corporation; that on or about July 12, 1929, said Warfel, while acting as assignee, took and received from the plaintiff the sum of $500 as a deposit on a bid for the purchase of certain real estate which had come into the control of said Warfel, assignee, as aforesaid; that thereafter the said Warfel was unable to complete the transfer of the real estate, and that plaintiff obtained a judgment against Warfel, as such assignee, for the sum of $500 and costs, which judgment has become final; that on or about September 12, 1929, Warfel, acting as assignee, sold and transferred to Kolb's Bakery the real property involved; that Warfel had not, at the time of the sale to Kolb's Bakery, or before or after said date, ever filed any bond as provided by section 3467, Civil Code; that at no time had Warfel ever filed any inventory, as assignee, setting forth the assets of the estate of his assignor, nor was such inventory ever filed at all; that Warfel has no other assets of the estate of his assignor. Plaintiff prays judgment that the sale from Warfel as assignee to Kolb's Bakery be canceled and set aside; that the said Kolb's Bakery execute sufficient instruments to reinvest the title to the property in Warfel, as assignee; and that Warfel be enjoined from further disposing of the property until the provisions of law governing assignments for the benefit of creditors have been complied with, being title 3, part 2 of division 4 of the Civil Code.

The defendants demurred on the general ground that the complaint did not state a cause of action. As noted, the demurrers were sustained, without leave to amend, and judgment followed.

It seems to be the theory of appellant that, inasmuch as the assignee had not complied with the provisions of the Civil Code, cited, the assignment was void. For the purposes of this discussion, this contention may be conceded. Yet little comfort comes to the appellant. If the assignment was and is void, it is necessarily void for all purposes. The result would be to leave the property still in the ownership of the assignor, and any dealing therewith negotiated by and through the assignee would fall. This latter result would include the claim of plaintiff.

[1] The plaintiff is not a creditor of the assignor, and claims no privity with the said assignor. Whatever steps the assignor or the assignee may have taken in subjecting the property of the former to the claim of creditors would be of no concern to plaintiff. The plaintiff dealt with Warfel as assignee, recognizing his assignment and his right to act thereunder. When Warfel agreed to sell the property to plaintiff, either he had the right so to do or he did not. It having developed, for some reason not stated, that a transfer could not be made, then plaintiff had open a variety of remedies. However, he chose to seek recovery of his deposit and pursued this remedy to judgment. This judgment, it may be assumed, remains unsatisfied, inasmuch as the complaint alleged that there are no other assets remaining in the hands of the assignee. The judgment against the assignee was a claim against the estate of the assignor. However, the statement of facts given by appellant indicates that this judgment was obtained at a date subsequent to the transfer of the property to Kolb's Bakery.

We may, as indicated, disregard the assignment altogether and view the case from the standpoint of two individuals transacting business. Plaintiff entered into the agreement of sale with Warfel. Warfel breached the agreement and sold to a third party. Plaintiff secured judgment against Warfel for the return of the money. It is obvious that plaintiff would have no cause of action to set aside the transfer to the third party, in the absence of some showing of fraud or connivance or at least notice.

Here there is no allegation that the judgment ever became a lien upon the property or that any judgment existed prior to the last transfer. There is no allegation throwing suspicion upon the sale as being in fraud of creditors, nor is there any allegation that the sale price was inadequate, or that the purchaser took with any notice, actual or constructive.

[2-4] Referring to division 4, part. 2, title 3, of the Civil Code, embracing sections 3449 to 3473, inclusive, we find outlined the entire subject of assignments for the benefit of creditors. It is provided that the assignor, or, in case of his neglect, the assignee, must file an inventory of all the assets of the assignor. Likewise is provision made for the making, approval, and filing of a good and sufficient bond. Section 3468 then provides as follows: "Until a verified inventory has been made and filed, either by the assignor or assignee, as required by the provisions of this title, and the assignee has given the bond required by the last section, such assignee has no authority to dispose of the property of the estate, or any part of it (except in the case of perishable property, which in his discretion he may dispose of at any time, and receive the proceeds of sale thereof); nor has he power to convert the property, or the proceeds of any sale of perishable property, to the purposes of the trust."

From the last clause it is apparent that, under the allegations of the complaint, the assignee had no power to sell the property in the absence of inventory and bond. He had no power to convert the property to the purposes of the trust. Thus limited, he had no power to act in any way or manner with reference to a sale of the property. As a consequence, the property itself could in nowise be affected or incumbered by any act of the assignee. Therefore when, without authority of any kind, he optioned the property to plaintiff, his act was merely that of an individual with but an individual liability to respond in damages or to return the moneys received. This liability has been fixed by judgment, and thereby the remedy of the plaintiff elected and exhausted. Whatever irregularity attached to the latter sale, plaintiff, being neither a creditor nor in privity with the assignor, may not urge the same.

[5] We have thus gone into detail to show the complete lack of any cause of action resting in plaintiff to set aside the sale, inasmuch as the order sustaining the demurrers denied leave to amend. Where it is apparent from the facts pleaded that no good cause of action could be framed thereon, the ruling of the court denying leave to amend was proper and an exercise of sound discretion. The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Action by Florence De Martini against J. W. Wheatley and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

Affirmed.

T. C. Boone, of Modesto, Robert G. Partridge, of San Francisco, and Len H. Honey, of Stockton, for appellants.

T. B. Scott, of Modesto, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This appeal is from a judgment in favor of plaintiff upon the verdict of a jury for damages sustained by plaintiff resulting from the collision of two automobiles.

The complaint and its amendment contains two counts, in one of which it was alleged that plaintiff was riding as a passenger for hire in the automobile driven by appellant Belle Cardoza, at the time of the collision; and, in the other, it is alleged that plaintiff was riding as a guest therein.

It appears from the evidence that on June 20, 1931, respondent was riding in an automobile operated by Belle Cardoza, and that, at the intersection of two highways, the car driven by Belle Cardoza collided with one operated by appellant Wheatley.

Respondent brought this action against Belle Cardoza and the said Wheatley, as the operators of said automobiles, and joined Joe Cardoza and Frances Cardoza, the parents of Belle Cardoza, as parties defendant, because Belle Cardoza was a minor and her application to operate an automobile had been signed by her said parents. Separate briefs have been filed on this appeal by appellants Cardoza and by Wheatley. Appellants Cardoza's sole ground for a reversal of the judgment against them is based upon the refusal of the trial court to submit to the jury two special interrogatories requested by them. The said interrogatories were as follows: "No. 1. At the time of the accident in question, had the plaintiff Florence De Martini, either paid, or agreed to pay defendants Cardoza, or either of them, for being transported in the Cardoza car? No. 2. Of what degree of negligence, if any, was Belle Cardoza guilty at the time and place of the accident in question? (State whether the same was gross negligence, or ordinary negligence, or slight negligence.)"

[1, 2] Since the amendment of section 625 of the Code of Civil Procedure in 1909 (St. 1909, p. 193), the determination of whether or not the interrogatories should have been submitted to the jury rests in the discretion of the trial court (Eaton v. Southern Pacific Co., 22 Cal. App. 461–468, 134 P. 801, Estate of Witt, 198 Cal. 407–426, 245 P. 197); and such discretion will not be interfered with unless an abuse is shown (24 Cal. Jur. 905; Oberholzer v. Hubbell, 36 Cal. App. 16, 171 P. 436). No contention is made by appellants Cardoza that the evidence did not support the verdict, nor that the instructions of the court did not fully and fairly cover every issue in the case.

[3] The evidence as to whether or not respondent was a passenger for hire is conflicting, but the facts conclusively show that appellant Belle Cardoza was guilty of gross negligence at the time of the accident.

We are of the opinion that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to submit the said interrogatories to the jury.

[4, 5] Appellant Wheatley contends that the judgment against him should be reversed for the reason that certain remarks were made by counsel of appellants Cardoza to the effect that appellant Wheatley was insured, and that counsel for Wheatley was appearing in the case as a representative of an insurance company. The remarks to which reference is made occurred as follows: The attorney representing the Cardozas was cross-examining Wheatley, and in the course of that examination asked the witness if he had not made a statement regarding the accident to a certain person. Thereupon the following conversation took place between Mr. Boone, the attorney for Wheatley, and Mr. Honey, the attorney for the Cardozas:

"Mr. Boone: We object to any reference to that statement, I am going to insist on that. He is not being fair. Let him bring that Insurance man here, whoever it is.

"Mr. Honey: That isn't an Insurance man, if anybody happens to ask you, that is a gentleman in my employ.

"Mr. Boone: I know the fat boy.

"Mr. Honey: You are the one representing the Insurance Company here, I am not.

"Mr. Boone: We will let the jury decide that."

No request was made by Mr. Boone that the court instruct the jury to disregard the remarks of Mr. Honey, though the court, in its instructions, did state to the jury that no insurance company was a party to, or interested in, the action.

The rule is well settled that, where the plaintiff introduces evidence that the defendant is insured, or by deliberate purpose or by successful tactics purposefully suggests this fact to the jury, it constitutes reversible error (Hodge v. Weinstock-Lubin & Co., 109 Cal. App. 393, 293 P. 80); and it is improper for counsel to endeavor to get such a fact before the jury by questions designed solely for that purpose (Nichols v. Nelson, 80 Cal. App. 590, 252 P. 739, Citti v. Bava, 204 Cal. 136, 266 P. 954). In the instant case respondent made no effort to bring to the attention of the jury the fact that Wheatley was insured, and took no part in the controversy between the attorneys who represented appellants. Boone, Wheatley's attorney, began the controversy by suggesting to Honey that he produce his insurance man, and was met by the retort from Honey that he (Boone) was representing the insurance company. It would seem that each was attempting to create the impression that the other was insured.

However, no authority has been cited that would require a reversal under these conditions, nor have we been able to find any. Appellant Wheatley next contends that there is no evidence to support the verdict against him.

[6] The accident in this case occurred at the intersection of Kierman and Tooms avenues, which cross each other at right angles. Kierman avenue runs east and west, while Tooms avenue extends north and south. The Cardoza car was traveling east on Kierman avenue, and the Wheatley car was going south on Tooms avenue. There was a vineyard along the north side of Kierman avenue, extending to the intersection of said avenues, the vines being in full foliage, and about 4 feet high, and on the west side of Tooms avenue there was a barn standing 15 feet from said avenue and north of said intersection 250 feet. Belle Cardoza testified that, seated in her automobile, at points 150 feet, 100 feet, and 50 feet west of said intersection, while driving on Kierman avenue, she had no difficulty in seeing Tooms avenue from the intersection as far north as the barn; that the vines in the said vineyard did not prevent her from seeing Tooms avenue, because the car was higher; that she could see along Tooms avenue for 200 feet north of said intersection, when she was 50 feet west of the intersection, but saw no automobile on Tooms avenue; that she was traveling at a speed of 25 to 35 miles per hour as she entered the intersection, and did not see the Wheatley car until it was within one foot of her car. The Wheatley car struck the Cardoza car on the left hind wheel, causing the Cardoza car to turn completely over at least once, after going a distance of 50 feet from the place of impact. Wheatley testified that he did not see the Cardoza car until his car was 25 feet north of the intersection; at that time the Cardoza car was 150 feet west of the intersection in Kierman avenue, and was traveling at a speed of 35 or 40 miles per hour, and that the speed of said car seemed to be increasing; that his car was proceeding at less than 15 miles per hour when he first saw the Cardoza car. He also testified that when he first saw the Cardoza car it was distant from him about 25 feet. Some five days after the accident he made a statement to an investigator, a Mr. Rains, regarding the accident, and in that statement he admitted that he told Rains that as he came to the intersection he looked to the left and saw the road clear in that direction, and then he looked toward the right, and for the first time saw the Cardoza car, squarely in front, slightly to his right, and that, before witness could do anything, the front of his car struck the left hind wheel of the Cardoza car, and that the Cardoza car entered the intersection just a little before his car. He also testified that his car was equipped with four-wheel brakes, and that he applied them when he was 25 feet from the intersection; that the front frame of his car struck the Cardoza car a heavy blow on the rear left wheel, sufficient to make a dent in the wheel and bend the front frame of his car. He testified that his view of Kierman avenue was somewhat obscured by the vines of the said vineyard as he approached the intersection, but by looking carefully he could see the tops of the cars moving thereon. Respondent was reading a time-table when the accident happened, and did not see the Wheatley car before it struck the Cardoza car, but she testified that to the best of her belief the front part of the Cardoza car had passed the center of the intersection when the collision took place.

Section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1436, § 30) provides that the speed of the car shall not exceed 15 miles per hour when traversing an intersection, where the driver's view is obstructed at any time during the last 100 feet of his approach to the intersection when he does not have a clear and uninterrupted view of the intersection and of all traffic upon all highways entering such intersection for a distance of 200 feet.

Section 131 of said act (as amended by St. 1929, p. 541, § 55) provides that a vehicle approaching an intersection shall yield the right of way to a vehicle which has entered the intersection. Appellant Wheatley admitted that the Cardoza car entered the intersection before his own car. His car struck the Cardoza car such a heavy blow that it dented its left hind wheel and bent the front framework of his car.

We are of the opinion that there was evidence that warranted the jury in finding that Belle Cardoza drove her car upon the intersection in a reckless manner, without first taking the precaution of looking to see whether vehicles were approaching the said intersection upon Tooms avenue. We are also of the opinion that Wheatley, by his own admissions, was negligent in the operation of his car. This collision took place at 6:30 a. m.; the day was clear and the sun shining, and, from the evidence, the jury had the right to believe that each of said cars was visible to the other for a distance of at least 200 feet from the intersection, had the drivers thereof taken the precaution to look. It is apparent that both approached the intersection at a speed that was not careful or prudent under the circumstances that then existed.

[7] If respondent suffered the injury by the concurrent negligence of both Belle Cardoza and Wheatley, then such negligence of each is the proximate cause of her injuries, and she may recover from either or both of them. Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134, Springer v. Pacific Fruit Exchange, 92 Cal. App. 732, 268 P. 951.

[8] It is the duty of the reviewing court on appeal to construe the evidence so as to support the verdict, if it may be done reasonably; that is to say, to accept as true such evidence as tends to sustain the verdict, unless it be inherently incredible, and to reject as untrue those portions which conflict therewith. Truitner v. Knight, 83 Cal. App. 655, 257 P. 447; Neher v. Kauffman, 197 Cal. 674, 242 P. 713.

We find no error in the record, and therefore the judgment against all of the appellants is affirmed.

HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOC. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR YUBA COUNTY et al.

Civ. 4700.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 27, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Equity ⇐66.
One who seeks equity must do equity.

2. Equity ⇐39(1).
When equity court takes jurisdiction, it takes jurisdiction for all purposes.

3. Prohibition ⇐1, 5(1).
Writ of prohibition should not issue for trivial causes, nor to restrain ordinary course of procedure.

4. Prohibition ⇐5(3).
Mortgagee held not entitled to prohibition to restrain mortgagor from proceeding with action to enjoin mortgagee from proceeding with sale under notice of sale published after mortgagee commenced pending foreclosure action, notwithstanding mortgagor did not specifically tender any amount.

Mortgagee was not entitled to prohibition, since mortgagee, by its foreclosure action, tendered an issue which had been joined, and when equity takes jurisdiction, it takes jurisdiction for all purposes, and the mortgagee could not oust the court of jurisdiction by a claimed right under the mortgage inconsistent with its action, and, since the mortgagor admitted its obligation but sought to have the exact amount thereof determined by an accounting impliedly offering its property of a greater value than the claimed indebtedness as security for the payment of the debt, the court which had taken jurisdiction of the foreclosure action had jurisdiction to proceed and determine on what equities, if any, relief would be accorded.

Application to the Supreme Court, by the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, for a writ of prohibition to compel the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Yuba, and Hon. K. S. Mahon and another, Judges of the Superior Court who alternate in holding sessions of the court in the County of Yuba, to desist from any further proceedings in certain litigation, wherein an alternative writ issued, returnable before the Court of Appeal.

Writ discharged.

Tobin & Tobin, of San Francisco, Rich, Weis & Carlin, of Marysville, and George A. Clough, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Richard Belcher, of Marysville, for respondents.

PARKER, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an original proceeding seeking a writ of prohibition to compel respondent court and the judges thereof to desist from any and further proceedings in certain litigation. The application was first made to the Supreme Court, out of which the alternative writ issues, returnable before us. The general nature of the proceedings and the grounds urged in support thereof will follow.

On April 18, 1930, or thereabouts, the Ellis Estate Company, a corporation, made and delivered to Hibernia Savings & Loan Society its promissory notes in and for the amount of $64,000, payable one year after date. The said notes were secured by mortgage upon certain real estate and improvements thereon, all situate in the county of Yuba. This mortgage was in the usual form, providing that the mortgagee was entitled to possession upon default and upon said default the mortgagee might apply for the appointment of a receiver to husband the rents, profits, etc. Likewise did the mortgage clothe the mortgagee with the right to liquidate all liens for taxes or otherwise. The said mortgage contained a power of sale in the following language: "And the mortgagor hereby empowers the mortgagee to sell and convey said mortgaged property at any time after default made in the payment of said promissory notes, or the interest thereon, or any of said installments as provided in said promissory notes, or after breach of any obligation for which this mortgage is security; and such sale may be public or private at the option of the mortgagee and may be for such price and on such terms as to payment or otherwise as the mortgagee may deem proper; at any such sale the mortgagee in its own name, or in the name of any person, shall have the right to purchase; and the mortgagor hereby authorizes and empowers the mortgagee to execute and deliver in the name of the mortgagor a good and sufficient deed and conveyance of said property, or any part thereof, and any recitals contained in any conveyance of the mortgaged property which may be made by the mortgagee must be deemed conclusive evidence of the facts recited."

Default having been made in the payments, the Hibernia Society, mortgagee, did on October 30, 1931, commence an action in the superior court, in and for Yuba county, seeking to foreclose the said mortgage. This action is now at issue, and was at issue when the alternative writ was issued herein.

At the time of the commencement of the proceeding to foreclose, the plaintiffs therein obtained, upon ex parte application, an order appointing a receiver to take possession of the mortgaged premises, which said receiver duly qualified and took possession of the property and the proceeds therefrom.

Thereafter, upon motion of the defendant mortgagor, made after due and regular notice, the court in which said foreclosure action was pending did make and enter an order rescinding and setting aside the order theretofore made appointing said receiver. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court from the last order and said appeal is now pending after motion to dismiss the same was denied. 13 P.(2d) 929.

On September 24, 1931, the mortgagee Hibernia Savings & Loan Society filed for record in Yuba county "Notice of Breach of Obligation Secured by Mortgage, and of Intention to Sell Real Property Described therein," declaring a breach of the obligation secured by the mortgage and the intention of the mortgagee to sell the property described in the mortgage. Thereafter notice of sale under power of sale given in mortgage was published and after passing of the original date of proposed sale an additional or new notice of sale was published giving public notice that the property would be sold on March 7, 1932.

The proceeding or action against which the alternative writ of prohibition is now outstanding now follows:

The mortgagor Ellis Estate Company on the 15th day of January, 1932, commenced an action in the county of Yuba against Hibernia Savings & Loan Society to enjoin and restrain the latter from proceeding under the notice of sale.

A preliminary order was entered restraining defendant in the action from any and all further proceedings under the power of sale and defendants' demurrer to the complaint and to the amended complaint was overruled and defendant allowed ten days within which to answer and the restraining order continued in force until the trial of said action.

The particular point stressed here by the petitioner is that the court below is without jurisdiction to proceed with the trial on the sole ground that the plaintiff in the action does not specifically offer to do equity by tendering or offering to pay to petitioner the amount of its mortgage debt or any amount.

[1] It is a very general principle of equity jurisprudence that one who seeks equity must do equity. However, it is another thing to hold that by a failure so to do no jurisdiction vests in the tribunal in which relief is sought.

The right of the chancellor to withhold relief presupposes his jurisdiction to determine what relief he will withhold. In the action under discussion the plaintiff admits the mortgage debt; it makes no attempt to abridge the debt, but, on the contrary, admits it. It alleges that the property subjected to the mortgage is of a value far in excess of the mortgage debt and alleges that funds have come into the hands of the mortgagee as a credit against the mortgage debt, the exact amount of which funds being peculiarly within the knowledge of the mortgagee, and asks for an accounting thereof before any sale is permitted.

Another controlling feature of the entire case is the fact that the petitioner herein first sought the aid of the court in its action to foreclose the mortgage. By that action it tendered an issue which has been joined.

We have not before us the pleadings in the foreclosure action. There is but one action to foreclose a mortgage, and from the recitals and admissions in the record we assume that the action brought is in the usual form of a foreclosure action wherein plaintiff seeks a decree determining the lien of mortgage and ordering the sale of the property encumbered.

[2-4] When a court of equity takes jurisdiction it is elementary that it takes jurisdiction for all purposes, and the petitioner herein having submitted its claim and its rights thereunder it will not be permitted to oust the court of jurisdiction by a claimed right under the mortgage inconsistent with its action.

There has been a receiver in charge of the property who has collected rents therefrom; there have been payments made upon the mortgaged debt to the extent that the sale under the power given by the mortgage would be to discharge an obligation indefinite in amount.

The petitioner herein has sought from the courts a relief that is in all ways adequate, merely a foreclosure of the mortgage. In this proceeding the court will determine the amount due after a complete accounting and enter its decree accordingly. The restraint of the sale under the power given on the mortgage in no way can affect any substantial right of the petitioner under the facts of the instant case.

When the petitioner herein submitted its mortgage and the debt claimed thereunder to the equitable cognizance of the courts it submitted for determination the entire controversy. After such a submission the chancellor would be empowered, by appropriate procedure, to restrain further proceedings as to a sale, without the necessity of a separate action. All that the restraining order before us and all that the action out of which said order emanated can accomplish is the maintenance of the status quo pending the determination of the foreclosure action.

If the writ herein should be made absolute, its effect would be to dismiss the foreclosure suit now at issue, to render moot the questions presented on the appointment of the receiver and the vacating of the order of appointment. It would still leave in issue the accounts of the receiver and the settlement thereof and all the expense, time, and trouble of the mortgagor incurred at the instance of the mortgagee would be as naught.

We have been cited to no direct authority that a failure of a plaintiff to offer, in his pleadings to do equity, deprives the court of jurisdiction. True, there is an abundance of authority, both here and elsewhere, that equitable relief will be denied or withheld one who himself refuses to do equity, but where one comes in and admits an obligation but seeks to have determined the exact extent or amount thereof, impliedly offering his property of a greater value than the claimed indebtedness, as security for the payment of the debt, we think that the court has jurisdicton to proceed and determine upon what equities, if any, relief will be accorded. We feel that the writ of prohibition should not issue for light or trivial causes nor should the usual and ordinary course of procedure be hampered or restrained by these extraordinary remedies.

If the action of the Ellis Estate Company proceeds to judgment as prayed, the net result thereof will be simply to defer the sale to the time of decree in foreclosure by which decree all of the rights of the parties will have been determined. On the other hand, should the action itself be stopped and the sale under the power of sale proceed, there will follow accounting and, perhaps, a multiplicity of suits involving the validity of the power of sale and the proceedings thereunder.

All that is involved in the entire controversy is the mortgage debt and the property mortgaged. The court below has acquired ample jurisdiction, at the instance of the petitioner herein, over all of the issues involved and over the parties and the subject-matter. Whatever equity that must be done by either party is within the power of the court to decree, as a condition of any relief. Full, complete, and adequate remedy may be obtained without the interposition of this court.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1932.

1. Frauds, statute of ⇐116(3, 4).

Corporation's guaranty of individual's account being required to be in writing, its agent's authority to execute agreement was also required to be in writing (Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 2309, 2793).

2. Corporations ⇐432(5).

Grocer could not recover on corporation's guaranty of individual's account, in absence of evidence that corporation's agent, who executed guaranty, had authority to do so.

3. Frauds, statute of ⇐156.

Pleading and proof in action on corporation's guaranty of individual's account for groceries held to show that individual was principal debtor, so as to preclude recovery, in absence of written authority of corporation's agent to execute guaranty (Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 2309, 2793, and § 2794, subd. 2).

The record showed that groceries were billed to individual and account carried in his name, correspondence between plaintiff and defendant corporation's agent showed that they were dealing with guaranty of individual's account, and complaint was based on alleged agreement of corporation to answer for individual's debt.

4. Frauds, statute of ⇐23(1).

Corporation's guaranty of individual's account held not original undertaking, not re-

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff furnished groceries to one J. M. Islas and sought to recover the balance due therefor from the defendant corporation. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Plaintiff based his claim against the defendant corporation upon a written guaranty of the account of said J. M. Islas, which guaranty was executed in the name of the defendant corporation on March 2, 1931, by one J. L. McMahon, an employee of the defendant corporation. This guaranty was revoked in writing by said J. L. McMahon on March 21, 1931, at which time Islas was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of approximately $380. Thereafter plaintiff continued to extend credit to Islas and received payments from him in excess of the balance due at the time of the revocation of the guaranty. Islas failed to pay his account in full, and plaintiff brought this action against the defendant corporation.

Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the defendant executed a "guarantee in writing * * * whereby the defendant agreed to answer for the debt of J. M. Islas * * *"; that plaintiff thereafter "sold and delivered to said J. M. Islas" merchandise of the value of $1,150.69, of which Islas had paid $530.14, leaving a balance of $620.55; that plaintiff demanded said balance of said Islas, but he failed and refused to pay any part thereof; and that thereafter plaintiff demanded of defendant that it pay said balance, but it failed and refused to do so. By way of answer, defendant denied, among other things, that it executed any guaranty, and alleged that said J. L. McMahon was not authorized in writing or otherwise to execute the purported guaranty. The trial court made findings in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant on the issues thus made by the pleadings.

[1, 2] In our opinion, the judgment of the trial court must be reversed. The agreement to answer for the debt of said J. M. Islas was required to be in writing (Civ. Code, §§ 1624, 2793), and, as said J. L. McMahon was merely an employee or agent of the appellant corporation, his authority to execute the written agreement was likewise required to be in writing. Civ. Code, § 2309; Clement v. Young-McShea Amusement Company, 70 N. J. Eq. 677, 67 A. 82, 118 Am. St. Rep. 747; Lindhorst v. St. Louis Protestant Orphan Asylum, 231 Mo. 379, 132 S. W. 666; Power v. Immigration Land Co., 93 Minn. 247, 101 N. W. 161. The testimony offered by appellant showed that said J. L. McMahon had no authority whatever to execute the agreement in question, and it is conceded by respondent that there was no evidence of any written authority. It follows that the findings of the trial court relating to the execution of the guaranty by the appellant corporation and relating to the authority of McMahon to execute the same on behalf of the appellant corporation are not sustained by the evidence.

[3] In support of the judgment, respondent contends that said J. L. McMahon had sufficient authority to execute the agreement, and that written authority was unnecessary. He argues that this is an original obligation of the corporation rather than an agreement to answer for the debt of another, and therefore not required to be in writing by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 2794 of the Civil Code. Respondent's contention cannot be sustained. The record shows that the goods were billed to said J. M. Islas, and that the account was carried in his name. The correspondence between respondent and said J. L. McMahon, including the original guaranty and revocation, shows that they were not dealing with an account of the appellant corporation but with a guaranty of the account of the said J. M. Islas. Respondent's complaint was based on an alleged agreement of the appellant corporation "to answer for the debt of J. M. Islas." The section relied upon by respondent has no application under its terms, unless the agreement is such "as to render the party making the promise the principal debtor, and the person in whose behalf it is made, his surety." There was neither pleading nor proof of such an agreement here, but, on the contrary, the pleading and proof showed that Islas was the principal debtor.

[4] Respondent further contends that, as "the alleged guarantee was given prior to and contemporaneously with the creation of the account," it was an original undertaking, and therefore a writing was not required. This contention is likewise without merit. The only authority referred to by respondent in this connection is the language found in 12 California Jurisprudence, 866, § 19, and the early California cases cited in the footnote. These cases are not helpful. They were decided under an earlier statute of frauds, unlike the present statute, and, with one exception, there was a writing signed by the party to be charged in each of those cases. In Clay v. Walton, 9 Cal. 328, the single exception mentioned above, there was no writing, and the court held that the agreement was invalid, regardless of the time when it was made. In the following section of the text (12 Cal. Jur. 867, § 20) it is said: "But if any credit is given the beneficiary of the contract, or he is in any degree liable for the indebtedness, then another's promise to answer for the debt is merely a guaranty, and void unless written." The authorities cited in the footnote amply support this portion of the text. In the present case credit was given to said J. M. Islas and he was liable for the indebtedness. The guaranty did not purport to make the appellant corporation the principal or original debtor. It was required to be in writing, and the authority of said J. L. McMahon to execute it was likewise required to be in writing.

We deem it unnecessary to discuss the further contentions of appellant, as it appears that the conclusions above set forth will be determinative of this litigation.

The judgment is reversed.

GEORGE H. THOMPSON, Justice pro tem.

In October, 1928, the plaintiff Martin Benson and the defendant F. J. White, each being then the owners of certain interests in real property, orally negotiated on certain terms (questions as to whether these terms embraced certain promises on the part of F. J. White, and, if such promises were made, whether they were made without any intention of performing them, have given rise to this action) an exchange of their properties. The properties were incumbered; the incumbrances taking different forms. As the result of such oral negotiation, deeds and transfers were on October 27, 1928, executed and delivered by the respective parties, and, with the object of equalizing the values of the properties exchanged, Martin Benson made and delivered to F. J. White a promissory note payable in thirty days for $250. At the time of the said negotiation there were on the property of White certain special improvements or equipment consisting of a gas tank, a pump, a power saw, pipe, wire, and electrical fixtures that White had been making a special use of, and also on this property there was interest due in the amount of $50.49, and a personal property tax, a lien upon the premises, in the amount of $197.02. The negotiation was, as has been remarked, oral. Plaintiff Benson claims that White promised he would pay the said interest and taxes, and would leave as part of said premises the said special improvements or equipment hereinbefore mentioned. White did not pay either said interest of $50.49 or said taxes of $197.02, and, on vacating the premises, took with him said equipment; his position being that he had made no such promises as Benson claimed. Benson had one of White's trucks attached under attachment proceedings which he initiated; some feeling ensued; a personal interview failed to adjust matters; and on December 5, 1928, a notice of rescission was served by plaintiff on defendants reading: "You will please take notice that by reason of your failure to pay Personal Property Taxes appearing on the Tax Bills for the property in the City of Albany you caused to be conveyed to us on the 27th day of October, 1928, and likewise by reason of your failure to pay interest on the respective loans and contract due and accrued to October 27, 1928, we hereby rescind all transactions we had in relation to the exchange of properties and demand that you convey back to us the lands deeded to you and situated in Stanislaus County, California, and return to us the note for $250.00; and we hereby offer to you a deed for the property conveyed to us situated in Albany, California, and also to re-assign to you the contract of purchase and sale of certain other lots. The description of all of said property is fully and completely known to you."

Thereafter the plaintiff brought this action for fraud, predicated upon the proposition of a promise made without any intention to perform, and asked for judgment and decree that the said transaction and the said agreement of exchange be declared and decreed to be rescinded, for restoration to plaintiff, and for return of note, etc. The defendants denied the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint. The case was tried before the court, and judgment went for the defendants. On the issues presented by the pleadings, the court (among other things) found: "4. That plaintiffs were not induced to make said agreement upon any false and/or fraudulent representations of defendants, or either of them. 5. That the allegations of false promises and false misrepresentations on the part of defendants, as alleged in paragraph VII of plaintiffs' amended complaint are not true." The trial court concluded that the plaintiffs failed to make out any case for rescission of the contract of exchange, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to take anything.

It is, of course, clear that a promise made without any intention of performing it, committed by a party to a contract, or with his connivance, with intent to deceive another party thereto, or to induce him to enter into the contract, is actual fraud (section 1572, subd. 4, Civ. Code), and that, when such fraud is established, the deceived party is entitled to rescission or other appropriate relief. This doctrine has received exposition in many California cases: Newman v. Smith, 77 Cal. 22, 18 P. 791; Hays v. Gloster, 88 Cal. 560, 26 P. 397; Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 126, 20 P. 382, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29; Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 739, 82 P. 436; Becker v. Schwerdtle, 141 Cal. 386, 74 P. 1029; Martin v. Lawrence, 156 Cal. 191, 103 P. 913; Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 P. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184.

[1] In an action predicated on this ground, the essence of the fraud is the existence of an intent at the time of the promise not to perform it. Becker v. Schwerdtle, supra, at page 390 of 141 Cal., 74 P. 1029. The existence of such intent at such time (actual fraud) is always a question of fact. Section 1574, Civ. Code; Bechtold v. Coney, 42 Cal. App. 563, 183 P. 841.

[2-5] The question presented to the trial court was whether the actual fraud alleged by the plaintiffs had been committed. The transcript discloses that there was conflict in the evidence bearing on this question of actual fraud. The defendants had denied it in their answer, and at the trial, as against the testimony of the plaintiff Benson, produced testimony to the effect that White had not as a fact undertaken to pay the said interest or the said taxes, that he was given the right to remove the said pipes, gas tank, pump, wires, etc., and that he acted in good faith as he had understood the agreement. As to the right to remove the equipment, there was testimony that White, at the time of making the deed, said to Benson: "If I make this deed now * * * I have a tank and a pump out in the back yard, * * * and also I have wires that lead from the back porch to the garage, I have there now, * * * these of course pertain to the trucking business, * * * and I would like to take them off the place when I go;" that Benson said: "You can have them. They will be of no use to me, because * * * I am going to trade the property, and they won't be any good." There was likewise testimony produced that Mrs. White said to the plaintiff Benson that she had an electric light in the kitchen that she had bought, that there were also some flowers, and asked if she could take them, and that plaintiff Benson said: "Yes, you can take anything you want to, Mrs. White." It was of course the province of the court to weigh this testimony and to attach to it its proper value. The credibility of the witness, as well as the weight to be given the testimony, are questions for the trial court. Section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.; Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 380, 119 P. 512, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1230; Rolland v. Porterfield, 183 Cal. 466, 191 P. 913; Dozier v. Hillman, 105 Cal. App. 127, 131, 287 P.

116. Findings of the trial court are to be overthrown on appeal only when they totally lack the support of substantial evidence. Dunphy v. Dunphy, supra, In case of a conflict of evidence, the decision of the trial court will not be interfered with, where there is substantial evidence to support the decision. Bank of Italy v. Zerga, 97 Cal. App. 285, 275 P. 476; Dowd v. Joyce, 85 Cal. App. 377, 259 P. 368; Estate of Burke, 198 Cal. 163, 244 P. 340, 44 A. L. R. 1341; Richardson v. Marshall, 201 Cal. 584, 258 P. 47; Bank of Italy v. Cadenasso, 206 Cal. 428, 270 P. 931, 274 P. 536; Murray v. Tulare Irrigation Co., 120 Cal. 311, 49 P. 563, 52 P. 586; Rolland v. Porterfield, supra; McRae v. McRae, 67 Cal. App. 480, 485, 227 P. 933. In this aspect, it cannot be held that the determination of the court was without substantial support in the evidence.

[6] It is further contended that, as this action is for fraud predicated upon the proposition of a promise made without any intention to perform it, the finding of the court hereinbefore recited is insufficient; in other words, it is contended that there is no finding made upon the issue of the alleged promises made without any intention of performing them. As against this contention, it seems proper to repeat what has already been said: In an action predicated on this ground, the essence of the fraud is the existence of an intent at the time of the promise not to perform it. Becker v. Schwerdtle, supra.

[7] In the case of Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra, where the complaint had averred (page 128 of 78 Cal., 20 P. 382) promises made without any intention of performing them, and where the court's finding in connection with such averment was "(8) 'That there has been no false representation nor fraud in fact * * *'" (see page 130 of 78 Cal., 20 P. 382, 384), a like contention was made that the judgment was not supported by the findings (see page 132 of 78 Cal., 20 P. 382, 385); but the Supreme Court said: "It will be noticed that upon the question of fraud the findings are in favor of the defendants. The finding is that 'there were no false representations nor fraud in fact.' This effectually disposes of that branch of the complaint." It would therefore seem that the finding of the trial court attacked herein is sufficient. As against such a finding as the trial court made, there could be no fraud. We think that the findings of the court should be held sufficient to dispose of the issues tendered by the plaintiffs.

No error sufficient to warrant reversal appearing in the record, the judgment is affirmed.

PEIS v. MOHR et al. (Hansen et al., Interveners).

Civ. 8195.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 26, 1932.

1. Courts ⇐92.

Courts' dicta should not be permitted to overcome long line of contrary authorities, unless urgently impelled by highly persuasive reasons not previously considered.

2. Divorce ⇐254, 255.

Trial court should not assign and dispose of community or homestead property by interlocutory divorce decree, but such award constitutes error of law, remediable only on seasonable motion for new trial, other appropriate motion, or appeal.

3. Divorce ⇐255.

Failure to move for new trial or appeal from interlocutory divorce decree, disposing of parties' property, within limitation period, renders decree final adjudication of property rights.

4. Divorce ⇐255.

Husband's failure to attack interlocutory divorce decree, awarding community property to wife, within statutory time, finally vested ownership thereof in her.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Action by Holger Jensen Peis, also known as Holger Jensen, against Ernest Mohr, as administrator of the estate of Hedwig Jensen Peis, also known as Hedvig Caroline Jensen, deceased, in which Clara Thomine Marie Hansen and another intervened as parties defendant. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Hazel Utz, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco (C. Coolidge Kreis, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

ATTERIDGE, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment in an action brought by him to quiet title in and to his alleged interest in certain real property in process of administration in the estate of his deceased wife.

Some six months prior to his wife's death an interlocutory decree of divorce had been entered in her favor against appellant upon the ground of extreme cruelty. No appeal or other attack upon this interlocutory judgment had been taken within any of the periods of final limitation prescribed by statute for such attack either by appeal or motion. By its terms the interlocutory decree purported to settle the property rights of the litigants. Its language in this respect was: "* * * The following described community property * * * shall be and is hereby awarded and assigned to * * * plaintiff * * * to be hers absolutely and forever." (Italics ours.)

Prior to the institution of the divorce suit, the wife had declared a homestead upon the particular property which is the subject of the present quiet title action. It is the contention of respondents that the effect of the interlocutory decree of divorce was to dissolve the homestead and to award the property previously supporting it absolutely and forever to the now deceased wife, and that, by reason of appellant's failure to attack the same within six months, it became and is a final adjudication against all and singular property and survivorship rights of the present plaintiff in and to the said community and homesteaded property.

In support of their contention, respondents rely upon a long line of cases, of which Abbott v. Superior Court, 69 Cal. App. 660, 664, 232 P. 154, and Klebora v. Klebora (Cal. App.) 5 P.(2d) 965, are fairly representative. Those cases in effect hold that, where an interlocutory decree has been entered which therein affirmatively determines how the community property of the spouses is awarded, and all periods of time have expired within which it might have been attacked either by appeal or motion, it thereupon becomes at the end of such periods of limitation a conclusive adjudication of all property rights embraced within its provisions.

[1] In opposition to respondents' above-stated contention, appellant urges that a trial court is without power to effect a final determination of the property rights of the spouses in and to community and homesteaded property until such time as the marriage is actually dissolved by final decree. His argument in this respect is that, since rights in both homestead and community property of the given character are essentially and fundamentally based and dependent upon the present and continuing existence of the marriage status, it consequently follows that such rights can only be overcome, divested, or altered by an immediately effective change of such legal status, and that such change can only be effected by a final decree of divorce. It must be conceded that much color is lent to the force of appellant's argument in this respect by certain extensive declarations to that effect which are to be found in the cases of Remley v. Remley, 49 Cal. App. 489, 193 P. 604, 605, Strupelle v. Strupelle, 59 Cal. App. 526, 211 P. 248, and Radich v. Radich, 64 Cal. App. 605, 222 P. 182, and also that the correctness of appellant's said position may not be successfully gainsaid if the certain referred to expressions of opinion contained in the above-mentioned decisions are accepted according to their apparent tenor without further qualification or attempted differentiation. But it is to be noted that in each of the above referred to cases an appeal was taken within the statutory period, and it therefore follows that many of the referred to expressions were in the nature of dicta, as indeed they are so characterized in the case of Klebora v. Klebora, supra. Expressions of the given character ought not be permitted to overcome the long line of authority expressing, in so far as they relate to the situation presented by the present appeal, a contrary view (which will be found cumulated in an annotation contained in 76 A. L. R., at page 293), unless some highly persuasive reason not hitherto considered urgently impels such action.

It should be further stated that these very cases were aptly distinguished from those declaring the more generally recognized rule (as contended for respondents) in the case of Abbott v. Superior Court, supra, upon the precise ground that in each of them appeals had been taken from the interlocutory judgments. By reason of the fact that the dicta of these decisions have frequently cropped out in one form or another in this and kindred appeals and have thereby had a manifest tendency to unsettle the state of the law upon matters which are frequently the subject of litigation, we deem it advisable to later herein point out another simple and fundamental ground of distinction, which does not appear to have been heretofore stressed upon, although it is but a corollary of the distinction pointed out in Abbott v. Superior Court, supra.

The basic decision upon which two of the three cases in question ground their respective enlarged premises is Remley v. Remley. The opinion in that case in so far as it appertained to the matters then properly before the court for decision, simply held that a trial court by interlocutory decree of divorce should merely determine how community or homestead property ought to be assigned, "but in such interlocutory judgment the trial court should not attempt to destroy the homestead character of the property, nor to make an assignment thereof." (Italics ours.) Considered by itself, this language falls quite short of authoritatively determining that a trial court is without power to or cannot in any event make the determination thus criticized, even though its act in so doing be concededly erroneous. It is true that the last above-quoted portion of the opinion is followed by the further declaration: "At the time of the dissolution of the marriage, and at that time only, the homestead character may be abolished, and the property assigned to the respective parties pursuant to the determination made by the court at the time of the trial"—but, in so far as the language last quoted relates to the validity and finality of an interlocutory decree actually making such determination and disposition of community or homestead property and from which no appeal has been taken, the same must be held to be mere dictum. No such situation (i. e., one involving the effect of a failure to appeal from an interlocutory decree) was before the court. On the contrary, the court was considering only a direct appeal from an interlocutory judgment and reviewing an assigned error of law, as it obviously had a right to do. This dictum was subsequently made the basis of the following more extensive declaration: "* * * The [trial] court could not assign or dispose of the community property * * * until such time as the marriage was dissolved absolutely by the final decree of divorce" (italics ours)—in Radich v. Radich, 64 Cal. App. at page 607, 222 P. 182, 183, although it was given a requisite and we think more correct qualification in conformity with the original expression thereof in the application given it in Strupelle v. Strupelle, supra, where the reviewing court contented itself in passing upon a direct appeal from an interlocutory decree of divorce with the following declaration: "The court therefore should not assign or dispose of the community property or homestead until such time as the marriage is absolutely dissolved. * * *" (Italics ours.)

[2, 3] From our review of the several cases bearing upon the question presented for our consideration, we conceive the true rule to be as follows: A trial court should not by interlocutory decree of divorce eo instante assign and dispose of community or homestead property, athough it may determine therein how such property shall be ultimately awarded and assigned when the marriage is dissolved by final decree of divorce; but, if such court by its interlocutory decree does in fact make such determination and award, its act in so doing constitutes an error of law which can be remedied only on seasonable motion for new trial or other appropriate motion or upon direct appeal. It follows that a consequent failure to pursue any of these remedies within any of the prescribed periods of limitation (of which the longest thereof is six months) renders such decree absolute as a final adjudication of the property rights involved, and as such immune from further or collateral attack. It should not escape observation that, in every divorce suit where the trial court obtains jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter of the action, including the matter of settlement of property rights, such court does not exceed its jurisdiction in making by interlocutory decree the final disposition of such rights thus criticized and condemned on direct appeal in Remley v. Remley, supra, but by so doing merely proceeds irregularly by erring in the exercise of such jurisdiction. Such errors and irregularities may be reviewed and remedied only in the manner hereinbefore pointed out.

[4] It follows from these considerations that the failure of the present appellant to initiate any attack upon the interlocutory decree directly awarding to his wife the property involved in the present quiet title action within the time prescribed by statute had the effect of finally vesting in the wife before her death ownership of said property, and that the judgment of the court below was in this respect correct. In view of this determination, it becomes unnecessary for us to discuss a further point urged by respondents in which they assert that a certain alleged "decree" of another department of the superior court, made in the exercise of its probate functions, had the effect of a conclusive adverse determination of appellant's rights in the present action.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. NOLAN.

Cr. 2173.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 6, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 18, 1932.

1. Criminal law ⇐589(2).

Objection that trial court abused discretion in denying continuance for accused's attorney to recover from illness held not sustained.

The record disclosed that, because of illness of accused's attorney, trial was continued for 1½ days, at expiration of which accused's attorney was present at court and thereafter without objection or requesting any further continuance announced readiness to proceed therewith.

2. Judges ⇐51(3).

Written statement of accused and supporting affidavit purporting to show trial judge's bias and prejudice held not to state sufficient facts to merit consideration, and were properly stricken (Code Civ. Proc. § 170).

Gist of reasons assigned in accused's statement that he would not receive fair and impartial trial if it were presided over by judge whose disqualification was sought to be established, was that theretofore judge had denied accused's request for postponement for one week, that judge's manner toward accused was harsh and arbitrary, his language, expression, and attitude were indicative of extreme and violent dislike, and that on one occasion judge stated from bench that he was opposed to having cases of such kind continued, and that they ought to be tried right away. Facts disclosed that several continuances or postponements of trial had preceded such remarks of the judge.

3. Criminal law ⇐300.

Denial of motions for leave to add plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" held not abuse of discretion, where motions were made without any supporting facts (Pen. Code, § 1016).

4. Criminal law ⇐265.

Refusal of motion for leave to add plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" after murder trial had commenced held not abuse of discretion though motion was supported by affidavits (Pen. Code, § 1016).

5. Homicide ⇐179.

Excluding certain testimony respecting irrational acts of accused in homicide case held not error.

Specifications of error were to effect that, though witness was permitted to testify that accused appeared irrational, he was not permitted to state as a fact that accused was irrational, and that, after same witness had testified that accused appeared to have irrational ideas concerning his fellow policemen, witness was not permitted to respond to the question to "tell us about that."

6. Criminal law ⇐1170(3).

Any error in excluding testimony of expert witness as to accused's capacity of forming or doing intentional or purposeful acts held not prejudicial, where substantially same testimony was subsequently admitted.

7. Criminal law ⇐1144(12).

Presumption was that court in striking out medical expert's testimony did not refer to testimony striking out of which would constitute error.

8. Criminal law ⇐1163(1).

Error cannot be presumed, but party claiming error must show error.

9. Criminal law ⇐798(½).

Refusal to instruct that jurors' oath was not mere empty formality, but that accused had right to expect that each juror took oath without any mental reservations, held not error.

Though the requested instruction constituted correct declaration of legal principles, refusal thereof was not error, because it embodied nothing that was new or novel and contained no idea or thought which was not within universal knowledge of all persons of ordinary intelligence.

10. Criminal law ⇐829(1).

Refusal of requested instruction substantially covered by instructions given was not error.

11. Criminal law ⇐53.

Any departure of accused from normal mental state induced by voluntary intoxication is no defense.

12. Criminal law ⇐774.

Instructions that voluntary intoxication did not constitute sufficient defense for commission of crime or furnish foundation for related defense of insanity held proper under evidence.

Though alleged defense of insanity was not specifically pleaded, defendant under general plea of not guilty was permitted to introduce evidence of consumption by him of large quantity of intoxicating liquor, and that either as result thereof, or as induced by some other cause, defendant was unbalanced, mentally irresponsible, and consequently incapable of forming an intent at the time when the act of which he was charged was committed.

13. Criminal law ⇐822(1).

Instructions must be considered as entirety.

14. Criminal law ⇐1162.

Mere error, unless it is prejudicial, does not constitute sufficient reason for reversal of judgment.

The prejudicial effect of an alleged error must be not only apparent, but must be so harmful as to clearly indicate that in its presence defendant actually, or at least probably, was deprived of the fair and impartial trial guaranteed to him by Constitution and statutes.

15. Homicide ⇐308(3).

Instruction that homicide committed in perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, mayhem, constitutes first degree murder, held warranted under evidence (Pen. Code, §§ 189, 203, 664).

16. Criminal law ⇐1037(2).

Prosecuting attorney's argument asserting facts rather than inferences properly deducible from evidence and criticizing conduct of accused's attorney held not so prejudicial as to require reversal, in absence of objection and request to disregard.

The alleged misconduct of deputy district attorney in argument, among other things, was that he expressed opinion that defense was outrageous; that defendant had been able to successfully walk around trying to balance a chip on his shoulder because he was ex prize fighter; that he had struck deceased in same manner that prize fighter would have struck her; that deputy district attorney proposed to examine evidence to determine whether defendant had honest genuine defense, and that he did not think blow on head which defendant received when 6 years old had anything to do with case; that man who was in habit of drinking on job probably drank a good deal when he was not on job also; and he also made caustic criticisms of manner in which defendant's attorney conducted defense as respects defenses of mental incapacity, and intoxication.

17. Criminal law ⇐719(3).

Aside from fair argument respecting effect of evidence, no attorney should venture bald opinion stated as fact respecting issue or effect or value or weight of evidence.

18. Criminal law ⇐723(1).

Deputy district attorney's statement in argument that defendant in murder case had only appeal held improper.

19. Homicide ⇐232.

In view of jury's implied finding supported by substantial evidence that homicide was result of attempt to perpetrate mayhem, no evidence was necessary to establish that killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated (Pen. Code, § 189).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Marshall F. McComb, Judge.

Edward P. Nolan was convicted of murder, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

William J. Clark and Nathan M. Dicker, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Buron Fitts, Dist. Atty., and Frank Stafford, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J.

From a judgment of conviction of the crime of murder and from an order by which his motion for a new trial was denied, defendant appeals to this court.

[1] Appellant complains that the trial court abused its discretion "in denying appellant a reasonable continuance for his attorney to recover from the illness with which he was confined to his room at the time the trial started." In that connection, in substance, the facts are that, although on the date when the action was set for trial, by affidavit it appeared that because of his then illness the attorney who represented defendant was unable to be in court, the record also discloses the fact that, because of the inability of said attorney to be then present, the commencement of the trial was actually continued for 1½ days, at the expiration of which said attorney was present in court, and then and there, without objection on his part to the commencement of the trial, or without requesting any further continuance thereof, announced his readiness to proceed therewith. Nor does the record show that at any time thereafter any request was made, either by defendant personally or by his attorney, that because of the illness of the latter the commencement of the trial be postponed either for that or for any other reason, or that after the trial had started a continuance thereof be granted. Nor is there any intimation by appellant that, because he was forced to go to trial at the time the trial actually was commenced, he was in any wise prejudiced in his substantial rights in the premises. It is therefore apparent that, without taking into consideration the rule that in the denial of a motion for a continuance of the time of trial, unless an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge is shown to have influenced the ruling, an appellate court will not disturb it, appellant's objection is not well taken. See Flynn v. Fink, 60 Cal. App. 670, 213 P. 716, where the authorities bearing on the question are cited.

[2] Appellant contends that the trial court was without jurisdiction to try the action against defendant for the reason that, on the day of, and immediately preceding, the commencement of the trial, under the provisions of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure, defendant presented to the trial court and filed with the clerk thereof a written statement and supporting affidavits by which he sought to show the bias and prejudice against defendant of the judge who presided at the trial of the action, notwithstanding which the trial court ordered the said statement and affidavits "stricken from the record" of the court.

A portion of section 170 of the Code of Civil Procedure is to the effect that, where the disqualification of a judge is made an issue, "the question of the judge's disqualification shall be heard * * * by some other judge." But in the case of People v. Berman, 117 Cal. App. 334, 4 P.(2d) 226, in substance it is ruled that, unless as a conclusion of law the written statement and the affidavits presented by the moving party contain allegations of facts from which the bias of the trial judge in favor of the opponent of such party, or the prejudice of such judge against the moving party, reasonably may be deduced, the trial judge is justified in disregarding the statement and affidavits presented in the matter and is authorized to make, and is warranted in making, an order by which such statement and affidavits will be stricken from the record and the files of the court. It therefore becomes of importance that, preliminarily, the question of the sufficiency of the statement and the affidavits which were presented by defendant to the trial court should receive attention. The gist of the reasons assigned by defendant for his conclusion that he would not receive a fair and impartial trial if it were presided over by the judge whose disqualification was sought to be established was that theretofore, in spite of what by defendant was deemed a sufficient showing of relevant facts, the said judge had denied to defendant his request for a postponement of the trial of the action for a period of one week (as to which reference hereinbefore has been had), and, in addition thereto, that the manner of such judge toward defendant was harsh and arbitrary, his language, expression, and attitude were indicative of extreme and violent dislike, and that on one occasion "said Marshall McComb (the judge) stated from the bench that he was opposed to having cases of this sort continued: that they ought to be tried right away."

Regarding the first "fact," which related to the denial of the motion for a postponement of the trial, as hereinbefore has been indicated, neither in the order itself, nor in any circumstance connected with its rendition, was any inference correctly deducible on which the ultimate fact showing either bias or prejudice on the part of the trial judge could properly or legally be rested. Nor does the second "fact," which dealt solely with generalities and which for its conclusion, as is admitted by appellant, depended at most upon "an inference drawn from conduct," rest upon a more substantial foundation. The only definite and concrete fact relied upon by defendant to establish the bias or the prejudice of the trial judge, to wit, his statement that "he was opposed to having cases of this sort continued; that they ought to be tried right away," even in the most extraordinary circumstances, could present no more than slight evidence of prejudice against the defendant which might exist in the mind of the trial judge. But, in the circumstances herein portrayed by the record, which include several continuances or postponements of the trial which preceded the remark to which attention has been directed, the foundational fact upon which the conclusion of "bias and prejudice" depended fell far short of presenting a situation which, in accordance with the requirements of the statute, legally demanded that the question of the alleged disqualification of the trial judge "be heard and determined by some other judge." In other words, the "facts" upon which defendant placed reliance for his "inference" that the trial judge was legally prejudiced against him were so feeble and insignificant in their nature and effect as to constitute no sufficient reason for a consideration of the motion, and justified the action of the trial court in striking from the record and files in the action the written statement and the supporting affidavits which defendant theretofore had presented in the matter. It therefore becomes unnecessary to herein consider either other possible defects in the proceedings by which the disqualification of the trial judge was sought to be established; or, on the other hand, to discuss and to determine the consequences which might ensue because of the fact that the trial of the action was had before a disqualified judge.

[3, 4] Appellant predicates error upon an order made by the trial court, after the trial of defendant had commenced and had been in progress for several days, by which was denied the motion made by defendant that he be permitted to add a plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" to the former plea interposed by him of "not guilty."

It appears that, on a day which by three days antedated the date set for the commencement of the trial, one of the attorneys who then represented defendant orally requested leave of the trial court to enter "the additional plea of not guilty by reason of insanity." No evidence or affidavit or explanation of any kind was then offered. In denying such request, among other things, the judge then presiding made the statement that "the defendant has had ample time during all these months to enter that plea without delaying the trial, which has been delayed once at his request. I will deny it (the motion) with prejudice. Then the question cannot be raised again and waste a lot more time."

It further appears that again, on the day when the trial was commenced, in the absence of any "showing" of facts to support it, the trial court denied a motion presented by defendant that he be permitted to interpose such additional plea. Still later, and at a time which was several days after the trial had commenced, but during the progress thereof, for a third time defendant presented to the court his motion that he be permitted to add to his former plea the plea that he was "not guilty by reason of insanity." The last motion was accompanied by certain supporting affidavits, to which the people answered by counter affidavits. For the third time the motion was denied.

The several pleas which may be made by a defendant to an indictment or an information respectively returned or filed against him are specified in the language contained in section 1016 of the Penal Code. Following such specification it is then provided that: "A defendant who does not plead guilty may enter one or more of the other pleas. A defendant who does not plead not guilty by reason of insanity shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time of the commission of the offense charged, provided that the court may for good cause shown allow a change of plea at any time before the commencement of the trial. A defendant who pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, without also pleading not guilty, thereby admits the commission of the offense charged."

Relative to a situation such as is here involved, in the case of People v. Northcott, 209 Cal. 639, 654, 289 P. 634, 640, 70 A. L. R. 806, the Supreme Court said:

"Appellant's motion to be permitted to change his plea from 'not guilty' to the plea of 'not guilty by reason of insanity' was based upon several purported affidavits, the substance of which was that two doctors had examined appellant, and reached the conclusion that he was insane when examined by them, and that certain attorneys were present when the doctors made such examination, and heard them say the appellant was insane. Section 1016 of the Penal Code provides that a defendant who does not plead not guilty by reason of insanity shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time of the commission of the offense charged, 'provided that the court may for good cause shown allow a change of plea at any time before the commencement of the trial.' We concur in the view of the prosecution that 'good cause' was not shown in the affidavits presented, and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to grant appellant's motion.

"When the appellant was arraigned he was represented and apparently well advised by counsel. He was fully informed as to, and aware of, his rights. From the affidavit of his own counsel it appears that he stubbornly resisted any advice and effort to have him enter the additional plea, 'not guilty by reason of insanity.' His sole plea, 'not guilty,' was not ignorantly induced, nor was it made through motives of hope or fear unduly operating upon his volition. In such a situation it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to refuse to permit the interposition of the additional plea. People v. Bostic, 167 Cal. 754, 141 P. 380; People v. Murphy, 62 Cal. App. 709, 711, 217 P. 810."

In the instant case, since no attempt was made by defendant on either the first or the second presentation of the motion to show "good cause," it is plain that no error was committed by the trial court in its order by which the requested leave was denied. As to the third of such applications, aside from the sufficient reason for its denial found in the clear indication contained in the language of the statute, that, even assuming that "good cause" may appear, the motion must be made "before the commencement of the trial" (which was not done in the instant case), the ruling in People v. Northcott, 209 Cal. 639, 654, 289 P. 634, 70 A. L. R. 806, to which attention hereinbefore has been directed, is to the effect that the determination of such an application rests within the discretion of the trial court. Since the record herein discloses the situation that the facts which appeared by the several affidavits of the respective parties afforded ample justification for the conclusion reached by the trial court on determination of the motion, it follows that the said court did not abuse its discretion in making the order of which complaint is made.

[5-8] Appellant complains that the trial court erred in sustaining certain objections to questions propounded by counsel for defendant to some of the witnesses introduced in his behalf, as well as in striking from the evidence certain testimony given by such witnesses. One of such specifications of error is that, although a witness was permitted to testify that defendant "appeared irrational," the witness was not permitted to state as a fact that defendant was irrational. Another item of complaint is that, after the same witness had testified that defendant appeared to have "irrational ideas concerning his fellow policemen," the witness was not permitted to respond to the so-called question to "tell us about that." In the opinion of this court, neither of such specifications of error merits serious consideration. The third of such criticisms of appellant of the action of the trial court relates to an order made by it by which, in the first instance, an answer given by a physician as an expert witness to the effect that he did not "think" defendant was "capable of forming an intent or doing an intentional or purposeful act," was ordered stricken out. Aside from the fact that the question asked of the witness was whether he had an opinion regarding the mental capacity of defendant, and consequently that the answer given was not directly responsive to such question, an examination of the entire testimony given by the witness leads to the conclusion that in substance the fact contained in the answer here under consideration was later repeated by the witness and permitted to remain in the evidence for the consideration of the jury. It therefore becomes apparent that, even assuming original error on the part of the trial court, no substantial injury resulted to defendant by reason thereof. A fourth criticism by appellant along the same line is that after another physician, who also was called as an expert witness, had testified generally to certain ailments theretofore suffered by defendant during a term of years, and in that connection the treatment which the physician had prescribed for defendant, the following situation, which is the concrete subject of appellant's present complaint, appears in the record, to wit:

"Q. Was he under your treatment later that year after that? A. Yes, he was.

"Q. And what did you treat him for then? A. For nervousness and a cough and some sweating at night. I did not make a diagnosis at that time.

"Mr. Clark: I think that is all.

"Mr. Moses: At this time I move to strike out the testimony as incompetent, not within the issues, not tending to prove or disprove the issues here.

"The Court: Motion granted."

Appellant's contention that the intention of the trial court was to order stricken from the record, not the last statement made by the witness, but his entire testimony, cannot be sustained. It is possible, though not probable, that such was the intention of the trial court. But such a course might have constituted error; and error cannot be presumed. It is the duty of the party claiming that error has occurred to show that it actually did occur. Defendant had ample opportunity to make certain just what testimony of the witness was included in the order made by the trial court, but failed in that regard. In reason, he cannot expect this court to "guess" that error was committed, when the record does not affirmatively show that such was the case. Besides, the probability that by its order in the premises the trial court had no intention of striking out all the testimony of the witness is more or less evidenced by the fact that, in similar conditions which affected the testimony given by the very next witness who was called to testify in the action the trial court refused to grant a motion which, had it been granted, would have presented the identical question which appellant now raises.

[9] A series of complaints is registered by appellant which arises from the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury certain instructions which were proposed by defendant. In substance, the first of such instructions was to the effect that the oath taken by the jurors that they would render a true verdict in accordance with the evidence adduced and the law as given to them by the court "was not a mere empty formality," but that both the law and defendant had a right to expect that such oath was taken by each of the jurors "without any mental reservations whatsoever."

That such an instruction would have constituted a correct declaration of legal principles may not be properly denied. But with reference thereto the presence of such a condition does not present a situation from which it inevitably must follow that, because the trial court refused to give the instruction to the jury, defendant was deprived of a substantial right in the premises, and which latter condition must result in a reversal of the judgment. The statutory oath which presumptively was given to the jury contains the essentials of the law which relates to the duty of the jurors. The proposed instruction embodied nothing that was either "new or novel." It contained no idea or thought which was not within the universal knowledge of all persons of ordinary intelligence. In such circumstances no error was committed by the trial court in its order by which the instruction was refused. People v. Daskam (Cal. App.) 11 P.(2d) 670; Beers v. California State Life Ins. Co., 87 Cal. App. 440, 466, 262 P. 380.

[10] In connection with other instructions which were proposed by defendant to be given to the jury, but which were refused by the trial court, the record discloses the fact that each of the legal principles therein contained was substantially given to the jury by means of other instructions. Hence appellant has no just cause for complaint.

[11, 12] Appellant also presents objections to certain instructions which at the request of the prosecution were given to the jury. The first seriously presented attack on such instructions is directed against that portion thereof which relates to drunkenness, or to voluntary intoxication, either as constituting in itself a sufficient defense for the commission of a criminal act, or as furnishing a foundation for the related defense of insanity. In that connection, appellant contends that, since the alleged insanity of defendant was not an issue in the action, for the trial court to instruct the jury as it did with reference to the legal effect which might be produced by the voluntary intoxication of defendant as far as his sanity was concerned, was argumentative, and hence damaging to defendant's rights. However, no definitive attempt is made by appellant to point out any "argument" which is contained in the instruction in question. If any argument therein is discernible to appellant, its prejudicial effect on the rights of appellant is not apparent. From time immemorial it has been considered good law, which has been enunciated by countless authorities, that any wavering or departure in a defendant from a normal mental state, which has been immediately induced by his voluntary intoxication, affords no basis for either justification, excuse, or any other so-called "defense" for the commission by him of a criminal act while in such condition. Under the general plea of "not guilty," defendant was permitted to introduce evidence of the consumption by him of a large quantity of intoxicating liquor, and either as a result thereof, or as induced by some other cause, that defendant was "unbalanced," mentally irresponsible, and consequently incapable of forming an intent at the time when the act of which he was charged was committed. Hence, in that connection, it was proper that the jury should be correctly informed regarding the legal responsibility of defendant for his acts, if any, which were committed at a time when as a direct result of an overindulgence by him of intoxicating liquor his "rational or reasoning powers were suspended."

Appellant also complains of certain other instructions or parts of instructions, which, at the request of the prosecution, were given to the jury; not that from a legal standpoint they were fundamentally wrong, but that they dealt with abstract legal principles which were inapplicable to the situation presented by the facts portrayed by the evidence.

[13, 14] Although reviewed singly, literally, and without regard to its relation to other unobjectionable instructions, it might be possible to reach a conclusion in harmony with the argument of appellant, when considered in its broader effect, and as inducement to other proper instructions, in nearly every instance the questioned instruction becomes absolved from fault and consequently freed from merited criticism. In order to rightly understand the effect of that which otherwise might appear in some of the instructions as prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant, it is only necessary to remember that instructions must not be considered singly, but as an entirety; that mere error no longer constitutes sufficient reason for reversal of a judgment; but that the prejudicial effect of an alleged error must be not only apparent, but as well it must be so harmful as to clearly indicate that in its presence the defendant actually, or at least probably, was deprived of the fair and impartial trial, which, by the Constitution and the statutes, is guaranteed to him. So considered, even the fact that in strictness some of the instructions may not be apposite to the facts adduced in evidence will not in itself afford a compelling reason for a reversal of the judgment. This court is clearly of the opinion that none of the instructions of which appellant complains constituted such an invasion upon defendant's right that he be given a fair trial on the merits, as for that reason would justify a reversal of the judgment which was rendered against him.

[15] But, with reference to the instructions given to the jury at the request of the people, as well as those offered by defendant for the consideration of the jury, and by the court refused, appellant's major attack is directed against the law as laid down by the trial court, which related to the implied intent which follows from an attempt to commit the crime of mayhem. It was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if a person in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate mayhem, takes the life of a human being, intentionally or unintentionally, it is murder of the first degree."

A summary of the immediate facts in evidence, upon which said instruction was based, is as follows: "Defendant rushed into a room where the deceased and a Mr. Williams were dancing. Defendant was wild eyed; he called Mrs. Duncan (the deceased) a double-crosser and other names; also accused her of kissing Williams, which she denied. Defendant then 'slapped her down and knocked her on the bed'; he then walked over to Williams, and upon Williams' denial that he had kissed the deceased, he knocked Williams to the floor. Williams got up and went into the bathroom, and then the defendant directed his attention to the deceased, who was lying on the bed, and said: 'I have not marked you yet, but I will'; and punched her in the eye, and then 'Mrs. Duncan turned over on her stomach on the bed.' The testimony of the autopsy surgeon discloses the fact that the left ethmoidal sinuses of the deceased were found to contain fat and blood from the left orbital cavity, the wall of which had been burst toward the mid-line; that the blow upon the eye apparently was one of the contributing causes of death, and could have been sufficient of itself to have caused the death of decedent." Respondent's brief.

By section 203 of the Penal Code it is provided that mayhem may consist of unlawfully and maliciously putting out an eye; and an attempt, although unsuccessful, to commit such an offense, is a felony. Section 664, Pen. Code. So, specifically, by section 189 of the Penal Code, in effect it is provided that a murder which is committed in the perpetration, or in the attempt to perpetrate, mayhem, is of the first degree. It is therefore apparent that whether defendant's efforts to "mark" the woman whom he was accused of having attacked actually would have resulted in the loss of the sight of one of her eyes was not in itself determinative of the correctness of the instruction.

As a witness in his own behalf, defendant denied having had any intention to commit a homicide; but, considering the evidence which related to the attack made by defendant upon the woman, it is obvious that it furnished a substantial basis for the implied conclusion reached by the jury that the declaration made to the victim that "I have not marked you yet, but I will," was but expressive of his intention to "put out an eye," or, in its legal result, to commit the crime of mayhem. And if from the evidence it may be inferred that it was the intention of defendant to "mark" the woman, and that in accordance with the several statutory definitions of mayhem, of "attempt" generally, and of the legal consequence which follows from an attempt to commit mayhem, the attack made by defendant in law constituted an attempt to commit the crime of mayhem; and that, although, even as a matter of fact, defendant was unsuccessful in his attempt to commit mayhem, the homicide was the result of such unlawful act, it would seem clear that the several provisions of the Penal Code to which attention has been directed would authorize the giving of the instruction of which appellant complains.

A general statement of the law with reference to the legal effect of a homicide which may result from an attempt to commit a felony has no application in the face of specific language of a positive statute which expressly provides to the contrary of that so generally announced. With reference to the several authorities from other jurisdictions cited by appellant in support of the legal principle for the application of which he here contends, it may be observed that, however well sustained by text-writers or by judicial opinions, neither theory nor abstract reasoning may prevail as against positive and specific statutory declaration. And so, in view of the provision contained in section 189 of the Penal Code to the effect that a murder which is the result of an attempt to commit mayhem "is murder of the first degree," authorities to the contrary from other jurisdictions in which it does not appear that in reaching such conclusion therein a statutory provision similar to that of this state was taken into consideration can have no compelling weight.

[16] It is urged by appellant that, because of misconduct of the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution of the defendant in the trial of the action, the judgment should be reversed. Such alleged misconduct occurred during the closing argument to the jury, and consisted, principally, in two different classes of improper remarks: First and foremost, of expressions of opinion by the deputy district attorney relative to asserted facts rather than to inferences which properly should be drawn from the evidence; and, secondly, as to certain criticisms which related to the conduct of the attorney who represented defendant.

As examples which occurred in the first group, it appears that either expressly or by implication the deputy district attorney expressed his opinion to the jury that the defense interposed by defendant was "outrageous"; that, as affected the question of whether defendant had a hallucination regarding the conduct of his wife, the deputy district attorney "thought" that defendant was justified in assuming that something was wrong; that the explanation of why, during the greater part of his lifetime, defendant had been able to successfully walk around "trying to balance a chip on his shoulder," was that he was an ex prize fighter; that defendant struck the deceased in the same manner that a prize fighter would have struck her; that the deputy district attorney proposed to examine the evidence for the purpose of determining whether defendant had "an honest, genuine defense"; that he did not "think" that the blow on the head which, at the age of 6 years, defendant had received, had "anything to do with the case"; that "a man, who is in the habit of drinking on the job is probably drinking a good deal when he is not on the job also"; that he thought "a great big foot would make more than one impression on the tender skin of a woman"; and, with reference to the headaches from which defendant appeared to have suffered, that the deputy district attorney would have suffered similarly if he had been "staying in jail waiting to go to trial on a murder charge."

In the second group may be found either some rather caustic criticisms, or some adverse insinuations, regarding the manner in which the attorney for defendant had conducted the defense. As illustrations of such oral castigations may be noted the remark in effect that, although there were readily available to defendant several medical experts whose testimony "cannot be purchased like a commodity," none of them had been employed, "yet we find him (defendant) putting on a doctor to establish this defense"; also a broad insinuation that, if the homicide had not occurred (as it did) in the presence of witnesses, a defense entirely different from that actually interposed by defendant would have been presented; that "Mr. Clark (attorney for defendant) is too familiar with petit mal and grand mal to permit his doctor to try to convince you Mr. Nolan walked around in a petit mal trance five or six hours, and they edged away from that and got into this amnesia"; that the prosecution did not appear in behalf of, nor owed any allegiance to, a private client, but that "we are here to present the facts or evidence to the court and to the jury"; that, although immediately preceding the homicide, defendant was under the influence of intoxicating liquor, because he had consumed such liquor in an asserted attempt to alleviate pain that was a necessary incident of the headache from which he was suffering, "it was misconduct for the deputy district attorney to attack defendant's counsel with the statement that we expected to show involuntary intoxication"; and that "it was his (attorney for defendant) obligation to employ all the sophistry that his experience and genius can suggest."

In addition to the foregoing, appellant specifies as misconduct of the deputy district attorney the fact that, in the course of his argument to the jury, he stated: "The defendant has the only appeal in a case of this kind. The People have none. He has been tried here by a jury practically of his own choosing. * * *"

[17, 18] It should "go without saying" that aside from fair argument as to the effect of the evidence, or as to what inferences properly were deducible therefrom, no attorney should venture a bald opinion, stated as a fact, with reference to an issue or as to the effect, or value, or weight, of the evidence, as it may affect any ultimate fact in the case. That, in its purity and strictness, the rule was violated by an officer of the court, whose particular duty demanded that he abstain from any conduct that might even in the slightest degree embarrass the administration of justice, is apparent. It is likewise obvious that, from the facts as hereinbefore indicated, the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution is not to be commended, but rather to be censured, not only on account of his having in effect endeavored to impress upon the jury his own unsupported opinions, not as related to proper deductions which might be made from the evidence adduced, but as to facts not in evidence, but as well by reason of the gratuitous criticisms and animadversions which were heaped upon a brother practitioner, who, as far as the record discloses, was free from fault. Nor in his statement to the jury that "the defendant has the only appeal in a case of this kind," etc., can this court find any justification for the deputy district attorney. It was a suggestion that might have been calculated to place defendant at a disadvantage. The statement embraced the possibility that no matter how great or important the error, or howsoever numerous such errors, which might be committed by the trial court against the prosecution, the people of the state were helpless, in that they were without remedy or relief. In ordinary circumstances, such a statement might have created a tendency on the part of the jury to strike a balance, which would effectually operate against defendant and his substantial rights in the premises. At the outset, it should be noted that with reference to none of the occasions to which reference has been had and as to which it is claimed by appellant that the deputy district attorney was guilty of misconduct, did the learned and widely experienced attorney for defendant protest or offer to the trial court the slightest objection relative to such objectionable remarks. It is true, as has been repeatedly ruled, that, where it appears that the remark is of such a nature and character that an objection thereto by the aggrieved party, followed by an order of the trial court striking such remark from the record and admonishing the jury to disregard the remark, could not have the effect of removing from the "mind" of the jury the prejudice against the defendant which the remark undoubtedly or most probably created, a failure on the part of the aggrieved party to make timely objection and motion with reference thereto will not deprive him of the right to urge such misconduct as a ground for reversal of the judgment. But to this court it is not perceivable that such a situation is here presented. An examination of each of the several remarks made by the deputy district attorney to which attention has been directed readily discloses the fact that, in itself, the remark in question was not of that importance, or so far-reaching in its effect, that its influence, if any, might not easily have been destroyed by means of proper objection and motion presented by defendant, followed by appropriate order and instruction to the jury by the trial court. It is conceivable that defendant feared that, by making constant objection to what he might characterize as prejudicial remarks made by the deputy district attorney, he might annoy the jury, and thus damage rather than help his defense. But, if he chooses to let the objectionable incident pass without remonstrance upon his part, he should not ordinarily be permitted to urge that he has been prejudiced by reason thereof. It is only by considering the several derelictions of the deputy district attorney as a whole that any prejudice to the substantial rights of defendant becomes apparent. But since it is obvious that, by timely and appropriate action on his part, defendant might have, and probably would have, prevented the occurrence of many of the several remarks of which he complains, or that failing in that regard the said remarks would have been stricken from the record and the jury would have been instructed to disregard them in arriving at its verdict, and that the damage of which he now complains would thus have been averted, it follows that the present contention by defendant that because of the situation he was not accorded a fair trial cannot be sustained.

[19] In substance, appellant further contends that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was insufficient to show premeditation on the part of defendant in the commission of the homicide, and consequently that the verdict of "guilty of murder * * * of the first degree * * *" and the ensuing judgment cannot be sustained. But, in view of the implied finding by the jury, which is supported by substantial evidence, to the effect that the homicide was the result of an "attempt to perpetrate mayhem," no evidence was required to establish the fact that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated. Section 189, Pen. Code; People v. Nichol, 34 Cal. 211; People v. Long, 39 Cal. 694.

The judgment and the order by which the motion for a new trial was denied are affirmed.

Civ. 4051.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 4, 1932.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Nov. 3, 1932.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1932.

1. Damages ⇐68.

Where owner paid certain mechanics' lien claimants, which constituted pro tanto part payment of sum due contractors, contractors held not entitled to interest from such date on amount of part payment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

2. Contracts ⇐295(1).

Contractors substantially performing held entitled to sum due on contract price, less amount reasonably required to complete building.

3. Damages ⇐68.

Contractors substantially performing held entitled to interest only on difference between contract price and amount due owner by reason of contractors' failure, and allowance of interest on full contract price was error.

4. Damages ⇐124(1).

Alleged delay of architect in furnishing plans, chiefly due to contractors' misdirecting letter to architect, held not ground for allowing damages to contractors, especially in view of contract.

Contract provided that time during which contractors might be delayed by act or neglect of owner or his employees, or those under him by contract or otherwise, or by strike or like trouble among mechanics or laborers, should be added to time of completion of contract.

5. Damages ⇐124(1).

$1,000 allowance of damages to contractors for architect's delay in furnishing plans held unsupported; evidence not showing any work was discontinued.

6. Damages ⇐124(1).

Allowing damages to contractors for owner's failure to furnish details for painting lobby held erroneous, where contractors never painted lobby.

7. Damages ⇐124(1).

Allowing contractors damages for owner's failure to select hardware held erroneous, where delay due to merchant's refusal to ship hardware on contractors' credit was not segregated by evidence from delay due to owner's acts.

8. Damages ⇐124(1).

Allowing contractors damages for owner's failure to let heating contract and subcontractor's delay in installing elevators held erroneous, in view of contract, especially where evidence failed to show progress of work on building was delayed.

Contract provided in substance that time during which contractors might be delayed by act or neglect of owner or his employees or those under him should be added to time of completion of contract.

Allowing contractors damages because prevented from using passenger elevator for hoisting building materials held erroneous under contract and evidence.

Allowance of such damages was improper, in view of testimony that contractors could not point to any loss suffered as result of being prevented from using such elevator and covenant in contract that obligation of contractors included furnishing of necessary labor, materials, and mechanical workmanship, including tools, implements, and appliances required, and all other things necessary for doing of work, and in view of further fact that contractors had own elevator for hoisting building materials and discontinued use thereof and began using passenger elevator, and that use of such elevator was not contemplated when contract was signed by contractors.

Where contract provided for time extension for completion of building in event of delay caused by owner, parties held to have adopted such method of remedy in lieu of monetary compensation.

11. Damages ⇐123.

Notwithstanding finding that contractors substantially performed contract, owner held entitled to reimbursement for expenses necessarily incurred in bringing building up to standard contemplated.

12. Damages ⇐123.

Where bathtubs as installed did not comply with specifications and building laws, owner held entitled to reimbursement for expenses incurred in properly installing bathtub.

13. Damages ⇐189.

In action by contractors, finding that owner's delay in making installment payment caused filing of liens by materialmen and prevented contractors from paying off such liens held not sustained by evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

Such finding was not sustained where against such installments there was sum due owner for expenses in completing building, diminishing installment payment more than one-half, and liens aggregated sum six times amount of money actually owing contractors, especially where record did not show that contractors had any financial responsibility, and there was evidence to effect that they were without credit, indicating cause for filing liens.

14. Contracts ⇐295(1).

As regards question of substantial performance, equity courts have adopted rule giving very liberal construction to building contract, so that contractor may be paid for work actually performed, and owner reimbursed for necessary expenses in completing building.

15. Contracts ⇐295(1).

In determining question of substantial performance, application of rule of liberal construction to building contract held largely within trial court's discretion.

16. Principal and surety ⇐59.

Rule of strict construction ordinarily applied to private voluntary sureties held inapplicable to surety for compensation on building contract.

17. Mechanics' liens ⇐315.

Where alleged delay caused by owner did not increase liability of building contractors' surety for compensation, owner held entitled to recover against surety excess over contract price which owner was required to pay to clear property from mechanics' liens (Code Civ. Proc. § 1193).

18. Mechanics' liens ⇐161(4).

Allowing mechanics' lien claimants interest from filing of liens until judgment held error, where demands were unliquidated and could be determined only by judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

19. Appeal and error ⇐1173(2).

Where contractors' surety did not appeal from judgment erroneously allowing interest to mechanic's lien claimants, appellate court, although striking allowance of interest from judgment as against owner, did not modify judgment in such respect as against surety.

20. Damages ⇐73.

Record held not to show that building owner's attorney's fees for defending suit by contractors consolidated with suits by mechanic's lien claimants were substantially enhanced by lien cases, and hence contractors were not chargeable with portion of owner's counsel fees.

21. Costs ⇐32(2).

In contractors' suit for contract price and damages for delay, where, after deduction of owner's offset, balance remained in contractors' favor, owner held not entitled to costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

On rehearing.

Judgment modified, and, as modified, affirmed.

For prior opinion, see 8 P.(2d) 856.

A. J. Carlson, of Modesto, and E. V. McKenzie, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hartley F. Peart, of San Francisco, J. M. Walthall, of Modesto, M. G. Gallaher, of Fresno, and Sylvester J. McAtee and Gus L. Baraty, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the Court.

The plaintiffs had judgment for a balance alleged to be due for and on account of the contract price agreed to be paid to the plaintiffs by the defendant for the erection of a four-story and basement hotel building on lots 15 and 16 in block 67 in the city of Modesto. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

In the same proceedings the defendant had judgment against the plaintiffs as an offset to their claims in the sum awarded the defendant as his costs for reinstalling a number of bathtubs in said building. From this portion of the judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The record shows a notice to the clerk, of the defendant's contemplated appeal, and a notice directed to the plaintiffs in this case setting forth the defendant's appeal from the judgment. The wording of the latter notice would apparently limit the appeal simply as to the plaintiffs named in the title of this action, and exclude consideration of all questions affecting lienholds and the bonding company that had executed the bond to insure the faithful performance of the conditions and provisions of the building contract involved herein.

On the part of the plaintiffs it is contended that the defendant's appeal is limited only as to Hansen and Buchen, but a consideration of the terms and provisions of the notice given to the clerk shows that it is sufficient to bring the whole case before this court for consideration. The matters set forth in the notice to the clerk are substantially the same as were contained in the notice involved in the case of Anderson v. Standard Lumber Company, 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65. Upon the authority of that case and the case of Estate of Nutt, 180 Cal. 422, 181 P. 661, it must be held that the notice given to the clerk was sufficient to bring all parties before this court upon appeal.

On or about the 25th day of May, 1923, the above-named plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a contract in writing, whereby the plaintiffs agreed, for and in consideration of the sum of $125,500, to be paid to them by the defendant in installments provided for in the contract as the work progressed, to erect for the defendant a hotel building in the city of Modesto, on the lots described, in accordance with the plans and specifications prepared by an architect named A. W. Cornelius. Work was begun upon the erection of said building by the plaintiffs, and continued thereon until about the 21st day of February, 1924, upon which date the plaintiffs, as contractors, ceased work, and thereafter demanded of the architect employed by the owner a certificate of completion, which certificate was not furnished by the architect, due to the fact that the hotel building had not been finished by the contractors according to the plans and specifications referred to in the contract.

Prior to the 21st day of February, 1924, there had been paid by the defendant to the plaintiffs, on account of the contract price for the erection of the hotel, the sum of $101,555, leaving a balance of $23,845. According to the terms of the contract, if the building had been completed in accordance with the plans and specifications, there would have been due to the contractors on the 21st day of February, 1924, the sum of $11,295, and upon the expiration of thirty-five days thereafter the further sum of $12,550.

As against the claim of the plaintiffs, the defendant alleged that the building was not completed according to the plans and specifications, and that he necessarily had to expend the sum of $7,284.80 in completing the same, according to the plans and specifications called for in the contract. Of this sum for the completion of the building the court allowed the owner $3,386.50.

On or about the 17th day of March, 1924, certain subcontractors and materialmen filed liens for materials furnished and labor performed and work done upon the hotel building, aggregating the sum of a trifle over $33,000. On the 4th day of August, 1924, the plaintiffs began this action to recover the alleged balance due on the contract, and damages for various alleged causes in the sum of between $37,000 and $38,000. Damages were allowed by the court in the sum of $3,323.64.

The trial court found that, notwithstanding the failure of the contractors to complete the building according to the plans and specifications as called for by the contract, the building had nevertheless been substantially completed, and the failure of the contractors to comply with the terms and conditions of the plans and specifications was adjudged to be true.

The first question presented for our serious consideration is the allowance of interest on the two unpaid installments; one allowance of interest dating from February 21, 1924, and the second from a date thirty-five days thereafter. The interest was allowed upon the full sum of both installments, respectively, from the dates mentioned, notwithstanding the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the amount of the first installment on the 21st day of February, 1924, and that, prior to the expiration of the thirty-five days thereafter, mechanics' liens had been filed in the sum of over $33,000.

[1] The record shows that, after the beginning of the action, and by stipulation of the parties through their respective counsel, the owner and the insurance company, respectively, paid $9,183.32 to the lien claimants whose claims were uncontested. Notwithstanding this payment which under the law constituted, pro tanto, a part payment of whatever might be due the contractors, the court allowed interest just as though no payment had been made. This appears to us to be erroneous. There can be no gainsaying the fact that a payment on the principal of a promissory note stops the running of interest upon the amount of the payment. Likewise, here, when the owner paid the sum of over $9,000, we do not very well see how he could be charged with interest thereafter on a sum which was no longer due the contractors.

[2] Again, the court allowed interest on the full contract price, irrespective of the fact that it found that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover that sum. The plaintiffs in this action were only entitled, under the finding of the court, to payment of such sum as might be due upon the contract price, less whatever was reasonably required to be expended by the owner in completing the building according to the plans and specifications.

The rule is thus stated in 9 C. J. 739: "The hardship of the rule requiring strict performance in order to permit recovery on a contract generally, when applied to a builder who has undesignedly violated his contract, and the inequitable advantage that it gives to an owner who receives and retains the benefit of the builder's labor and materials have led to its qualification; and it is generally held that, where the compensation is due only on the performance of the contract, a literal and strict performance is not required, and if the builder, acting in good faith and intending and attempting to perform his contract, does so, he may recover the contract price, notwithstanding slight and trivial defects or deviations in performance, for which compensation may be made, in all its material and substantial particulars, by an allowance to the owner, but the owner is entitled to an allowance for the damages he may suffer by reason of the failure to perform strictly, such as the cost or expense of putting the structure or work in the condition called for by the contract." And further, as to what constitutes a substantial compliance: "There is a substantial performance where a variance from the specifications of the contract is inadvertent or unintentional and unimportant, and is one by which the building or structure as a whole is not impaired; where the building or structure is actually used after it is erected for its intended purpose; where the defects can be remedied by the owner without any great expenditure, and without material damage to other parts of the structure, and may without injustice be compensated for by deductions from the contract price; and it is apparent that the builder endeavored in good faith to fulfil his contract."

[3] It thus appears that the contractors were not, on the 21st day of February, 1924, or at a period thirty-five days thereafter, or in fact at any time preceding the entry of judgment, entitled to recover the full contract price. The court in this instance gave judgment for the full contract price and interest thereon, and then offset the amount found due the owner by reason of the sums necessarily expended by him in finishing the building. This, of course, gave the contractors interest on a sum which they never were entitled to recover, and, if they were not entitled to recover, it follows as a necessary conclusion that they were not entitled to interest on money that was not due them. Not being entitled to payment for work that was never done, for materials that were never furnished, and for labor that was not performed, they are certainly not entitled to interest on the sum of money that they should have expended, and the work they should have done, and the materials they ought to have furnished.

The court found that, after the payment by the insurance company and by the owner, of the sum of $18,366.64 on undisputed liens, there was still due to lien claimants the aggregate sum of $14,578.16, from which it follows that there was but little due the contractors, as section 1193 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Any contractor shall be entitled to recover * * * only such amount as may be due him according to the terms of his contract, after deducting all claims of other parties for work done and materials furnished." Under this section evidence of the contract price, and work done and omitted therefrom, is properly received to determine the amount remaining in the owner's hands, which is applicable to the payment of lienholders.

It is earnestly contended by the appellant that no interest whatever should be allowed to the contractors; that whatever was due them was an unliquidated demand by reason of their failure to complete the building according to the plans and specifications and the subsequent necessity of the owner to expend a considerable sum in so doing, and that this sum remained to be adjudged by the court. However, the weight of authority seems to be to the contrary; it being held in most cases that the contractor is entitled to interest on whatever is due upon the contract price, less the amount found due the owner by reason of the failure of the contractors. Thus, in the case of Pearson v. Ryan, 42 R. I. 83, 105 A 513, 3 A. L. R. 805, the majority rule is thus stated: "A payment called for by a construction contract upon completion of the building is liquidated from time of demand, within the rule that interest is allowed as damages for failure to pay a liquidated demand when it is due, although the court allows a rebate from the amount claimed because of unsatisfactory workmanship and materials." The difference in the case at bar from the facts in the case which we have just cited is that here a considerable portion of the work was left unperformed. The case which we have cited further illustrates the rule as follows: "Undoubtedly there is a clear distinction between a claim for damages entirely unliquidated, as for example, claims for damages arising from assault and battery, * * * or from slander and libel, which are wholly at large, and a liquidated claim, where there is an express contract to pay a sum certain at a fixed time. In the former cases, the amount of damages is unknown until determined, after the presentation of evidence, by a decision, award, or verdict. In the contract case, both parties know what the claim is, and when it is due and payable. It is in dealing with cases lying between these extremes, where the distinction is less clear and obvious, that courts have so differed in their interpretation and application of the rule as to interest that their decisions are far from harmonious as to when interest may be allowed."

The action in the case at bar is not based upon quantum meruit, or strictly for work and labor performed, but is based upon the contract for what the court found to be a substantially completed building. Thus in the case of Healy v. Fallon, 69 Conn. 228, 37 A. 495, cited in the Pearson Case, we find the following: "The defendants claimed that the house was not finished as called for in the contract, upon which claim some deduction was made by the trial court from the contract price. On pages 235 et seq. of 69 Conn. [37 A. 495], the court says: 'We are also of opinion that the court did not err in allowing interest to the date of judgment upon the sum found to be due after deducting the damages caused by the deviations from the contract. * * * It is difficult on principle to see why he should not recover, as compensation for that detention, damages measured by the legal rate of interest upon the sum so detained for that time. It is said, however, that the amount due was unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, and that interest is never allowed upon unliquidated amounts. It may be conceded that the amount due the plaintiff was in a certain sense unliquidated up to the time of the judgment, inasmuch as the amount due him under the contract, which was a liquidated amount, was to be lessened by the as yet unascertained damages caused by his deviations from the contract; but it is not true that damages measured by the rate of interest are never allowed for the nonpayment of money, where the claim is an unliquidated one.' " It was then held that interest should be allowed upon the amount due the contractor from the date of the completion of the building, which amount was the contract price, less the allowance made to the owner for finishing the building.

Beginning on page 809 of 3 A. L. R., there has been appended to the case of Pearson v. Ryan, supra, a large number of authorities and extended quotations showing the rule generally followed which we have set forth herein. The only California case where the precise question has come before the court is that of McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal. App. 482, 123 P. 354, 357, where the rule which we have stated was followed.

A number of California cases have been cited by counsel where the actions have been based upon quantum meruit, or for work and labor performed and materials furnished, and not upon contract. In all these cases interest has been denied prior to entry of judgment. It would serve no useful purpose to review them by reason of the facts being different from those here presented, which we think brings this cause within the rule announced in Pearson v. Ryan, supra, and the cases found in the annotations as just stated.

The court allowed the plaintiffs, as damages for delay, the sum of $3,323.64. Of this sum the defendant seriously contends that the following items should be stricken therefrom, to wit, the sum of $1,000 alleged to have been damages caused by delay of the architect in furnishing plans; the sum of $500 for failure to furnish details for painting; the sum of $50 for failure to select a color for painting; the sum of $500 for failure to select the hardware; the sum of $100 for failure to let heating contract; and the sum of $200 for failure of elevator subcontractors.

The terms of the contract entered into between the parties contains, among other things, the following: "The contractors covenant and agree to commence the construction of the work undertaken by them within ten days after the signing of this contract, and to prosecute the same diligently and with a sufficient force of men, equipment and material so as to fully complete this contract not later than October 1, 1923; provided, however, that the time during which the contractors may be delayed by the acts or neglect of the owner, or his employees, or those under him by contract or otherwise, or by the act of God, which the contractors could not have reasonably foreseen and provided for, or by stormy and inclement weather which delays the work, or by strikes or like trouble among mechanics or laborers which delays said work and which are not caused thereby, or the continuance of which is not due to any unreasonable acts or conduct on the part of the contractors, shall be added to the time of completion, as aforesaid."

The contract then further contains a provision that payments of installments shall be made at certain times, and that the owner shall be liable to the contractors for any damages occasioned them by delay in making payments.

It appears that a contract in the precise form came before the court for consideration in the case of Seebach v. Kuhn, 9 Cal. App. 485, 99 P. 723, in which it was held that, as the parties had agreed that extension of time for the completion of the building should result from any of the acts specified above, damages could not be predicated thereon. This holding appears to be supported by the case of Goss v. Northern Pacific Hospital, 50 Wash. 236, 96 P. 1078; Haydnville v. Art Institute (C. C.) 39 F. 484; Richard v. Clark, 43 Misc. 622, 88 N. Y. S. 242; Cornell v. Schuylkill County (C. C. A.) 222 F. 876.

In addition to the cases cited, we may call attention to 9 C. J. 790, § 132, relative to the liability of owners where the law as stated in the text is as set forth in the foregoing cases, that, where the parties have stipulated in the contract that delays shall operate as an extension of time for the performance of the contract, no other penalties follow, and that damages cannot be allowed for such delays, unless something else appears in the case.

The court made no finding of any fraudulent acts on the part of the architect, nor on the part of the owner. In addition to this, it appears from the record that, wherever there was a delay, the contractor immediately claimed an extension of time, and did obtain an extension of time for various reasons, from October 1, 1923, until February 21, 1924.

Notwithstanding the fact that the law appears to be that, under contracts containing a clause such as the one involved in this action, there can be no claim for damages on account of delays caused by any of the persons mentioned in the paragraph of the contract under consideration, we will nevertheless give some attention to the different items which the court did allow as damages for delays.

[4, 5] The first of these items is an allowance of $1,000 to the contractors for and on account of the alleged failure of the architect to furnish detailed plans and specifications.

The record shows that the contract was awarded on or about the 23d day of May, 1923, and that work was begun by the contractors on the following day; that thereafter, and during the first week in June, 1923, the contractors wrote a letter addressed to the architect in San Francisco, but by some mistake or other failed to send the letter to the correct address. Seven days thereafter another letter was forwarded by the contractors, to wit, on the 13th day of June, correctly addressed to the architect at his office in San Francisco. On the following day the detailed plans and specifications called for by the contractors were received by them from the architect. It thus appears that for the eight days' delay, as claimed by the contractors, seven days of the delay were due to the mistake of the contractors themselves.

Our attention has not been called to any testimony showing that the work of the contractors was actually delayed for any time by reason of not receiving the plans and specifications earlier than the 14th of June. It can scarcely be claimed that the failure of the architect to furnish the plans, based upon a notification to him which was misdirected, constitutes a basis for penalizing the owner, especially in view of the paragraph of the contract to which we have referred. While not directed to any testimony showing any delay in the work, we have found the following in the transcript of the testimony:

"Q. Now, there was not any finishing work going on in the building at that time? A. There was other work going on that depended on the measurements.

"Q. Did it cost you any more in actual money, other than this so called delay by reason of failure to get the plans on the 13th or 14th, rather, the 13th? A. Well, there is one item again that would be hard to say just for one day.

"Q. Can you say, or give me one dollar that you lost by reason, as a result of the so-called loss between the 13th and the 14th? A. No, I could not give that to you.

"Q. Now, let me ask you, you didn't lay off any man between the 13th and 14th, did you? A. Between 13th and 14th, no, I cannot say that we did."

The testimony further shows that the men continued work.

"Q. Now, where did you get this figure of $125.66 a day that is mentioned in your bill of particulars; just where did you get that? A. I get that item from taking the amount that we had estimated that we would earn on the job, the time it took to do the job from the 1st of June, way until the 15th or 16th of February. I took all the expenses, or part of it, or part of the overhead it would take for this extra time, and items such as that, and computed them together and divided it by the number of days."

In view of the fact that there is no showing that any work was discontinued, it is evident that the testimony does not uphold this assessment of damages against the owner, irrespective of the contract provisions.

[6] The next item called to our attention by the appellants, allowed as damages, is the sum of $500 for an alleged failure to furnish details for painting. Just how this item of damages got into the allowance does not very satisfactorily appear. The claim of the contractors apparently is based upon an alleged failure to select color schemes for painting the lobby. Without discussing the testimony as to the merits of this contention, it is sufficient to state that the record shows that the contractor never painted the lobby, and that the work was done by the owner at an expense to him of over $400.

The next item of any importance is the alleged damage allowed in the sum of $500 for failure of the owner to select hardware. The record shows that the owner or architect was by the contract allowed to select the hardware, which was to be paid for by the contractors. It further appears that the owner made a selection of the hardware, and that it was ordered by the contractors. Following this, the record discloses that the house from which the hardware was ordered declined to ship the hardware on the credit of the contractors, claiming that their credit was not such as to warrant the shipment unless payment was guaranteed by the owner. This caused considerable delay in the shipment of the hardware, and finally resulted in the owner and contractors going to San Francisco, and, by stipulation, arranging for the payment of the hardware, and the acceptance of it in San Francisco. It does appear that the owner at first declined to finally accept the hardware until it was installed in the building, but this does not appear to be the basic cause of the delay, nor does the testimony show for what time any delay was due to this act of the owner.

[7] Again, it is not pretended that there was any fraudulent act on the part of the owner in any particular in relation to the hardware, and the time of the delay, which was reasonably chargeable to the fact that the commercial house with which they were dealing declined to ship the invoice of hardware on the credit of the contractors, is certainly not chargeable against the owner. Not having segregated the time of delay due to the lack of financial responsibility of the contractors from alleged acts of the owner, it follows that this allowance of damages has no support in the testimony.

Again, an allowance of $50 was made on account of the alleged failure of the owner in selecting colors for certain painting, but the testimony does not show that work was stopped on the building on this account.

[8] An item of $100 appears in the allowance of damages on account of failure to let heating contract, and also $200 for delay of the subcontractors in installing an elevator. These provisions are likewise squarely covered by the paragraph of the contract set out in this opinion.

An examination of the testimony shows that the contract for the heating plant was let on the 25th day of June, 1923. On the next day the measurements were sent by the contractor who had contracted to put in the heating plant, to a Sacramento firm, to be filled. We have scanned the record in vain to find any testimony showing that the progress of the work on the building was delayed by the failure of the owner to let the contract for the heating plant at an earlier date. The testimony does show, however, that portions of the building were not ready for the installation of the heating plant until after the heating plant was roughed in. It appears that the contractors did not know just when the heating plant was finally roughed in, nor do we find any specific testimony showing that the contractors were delayed, to their damage in the sum of $500.

In relation to the damages claimed in connection with the painting, we may quote the following testimony showing the lack of any basis for a judgment of damages (testimony of contractor Hansen): "Q. How did you arrive at $1200.00?" (Amount of damages claimed). "A. That is another item I cannot give you."

As to the delay respecting the selection of the hardware and the testimony showing damages, and the uncertainty of any basis therefor, we may quote the following testimony of contractor Hansen: "Q. Now, what effect did that delay in the hardware have on the progress of the work? A. We had our doors ready to hang; they stood for five weeks before we had hardware to hang them with; they warped and that cost us considerable more to handle the doors."

We need not specify further the items of damages claimed on account of delays, for the testimony shows that the damages in relation to each item were fixed according to the testimony hereinbefore set forth, which does not furnish any basis therefor.

In addition to what we have stated as to items that should be stricken from the allowance by the court, it appears from the record that there should have been allowed the owner a credit for electrical fixtures in the sum of $460, credit on plumbing for sidewalk elevator in the sum of $46, and credit on mail chute in the sum of $452, aggregating the sum of $958. These items were agreed to by the contractors, and will be accepted as correct, even though a somewhat larger sum is claimed by the appellant on account of the omission of the mail chute. The subtracting of the aggregate amount of these items from the amount found due the contractors appears to have been overlooked by the trial court.

[9] The record shows that during the course of the construction of the building the contractors discontinued the use of their own elevator for hoisting building materials, and began using the passenger elevator installed in the building, to the use of which the owner objected to the contractor who installed the passenger elevator, and thereupon the contractor having charge of the installation of the passenger elevator notified the plaintiffs in this action to discontinue use of the same. By reason of this transaction the plaintiffs claimed damage in the sum of $465, of which sum the court allowed $250. The contract signed by the plaintiffs in this action contained the following: "The obligation of the contractors includes the furnishing of the necessary labor, materials and mechanical workmanship, including tools, implements and appliances required, and all other things necessary for the doing of work shown on said plans and specifications, except as hereinafter noted." The elevator shaft in the building provided for two passenger elevators, and were not intended for use as freight elevators. Upon being questioned as to the extent of the damages mentioned in this item, the plaintiff Hansen testified as follows:

"Q. What is the basis of the $465? A. That I could not say.

"Q. You cannot point to a single dollar, can you, that was lost by reason thereof? A. No, I cannot."

Further: "Q. So when you signed the contract did you rely at all on the possibility of using the owner's elevator to hoist materials? A. No, sir, we did not."

In view of this testimony and the covenant in the contract, and in view of the further fact that the plaintiffs had their own elevator for hoisting building material, and discontinued the use thereof and began using an elevator which was not intended for the uses to which it was put, and that the use of that elevator was not contemplated when the contract was signed by the plaintiffs, it is evident that the $250 allowed as damages in this particular must be stricken from the judgment.

[10] In concluding our discussion of the testimony showing that the items allowed as damages are not supported, we may again refer to the contract in this case, which specifies that in such cases the time for completion is to be extended, and the parties adopted that as the remedy in lieu of monetary compensation, to which the following quotation from the case of Richard v. Clark, 43 Misc. 622, 88 N. Y. S. 242, is applicable, to wit: "Where a contract under which plaintiff was to construct a model of defendant's residence, according to plans furnished by defendant's architect, provided that, if plaintiff should be delayed in the completion of his work by the delay or default of the owner or architect, the time fixed by the contract for the completion of the work should be extended for a period equivalent to the time lost, the time clause affected plaintiff's liability alone, and absolved him from liability for delay to the extent and in the manner provided thereby, but did not authorize a recovery in damages by him for delay of the architect in furnishing plans."

[11] This brings us to a consideration of the expenses incurred by the owner in completing the contract according to the plans and specifications. The claim of the owner in this particular is that he necessarily expended the sum of $7,284.80, of which the court allowed only $3,386.52. In fixing this sum, the court apparently overlooked the item of $797.34, being expenses for labor and material in properly installing fire-shutters. Our attention has not been called to any testimony contradicting such expenditure. Not being properly installed, the full cost should have been allowed. The court allowed the full sum of $2,824.02 for installing bathtubs; $200 was allowed for correcting the defective columns in front of the building, the undisputed testimony showing, however, that the cost thereof was the sum of $250, respondents' contention being only that no sum should have been allowed. For plastering bathrooms the testimony shows that the owner expended for labor and materials the sum of $327.35, for which the court awarded only $200. A general account specified in the bill of particulars covering labor, materials furnished, etc., in the sum of $1,524.50, was either overlooked or disregarded in the findings. The items to which we are referring were supported by testimony showing bills submitted by the parties who did the work upon the building, and by checks showing that the owner had paid therefor. Our attention has not been called to any testimony showing that the work was not done, or showing that the work was unnecessary in order that the building might be finally brought up to the standard contemplated by the plans and specifications, and necessary to be done in order that the building should be rendered fit and proper for the uses and purposes for which it was intended.

While the record shows that the court found the building substantially completed on the 21st day of February, 1924, there is no disputing the fact that the hotel was not then finished as contemplated by the plans and specifications, nor could it then be used for hotel purposes.

[12] From the allowance to the owner for the expenses incurred in labor and materials, and especially for the allowance of the $2,824.02 for installing bathtubs and work on bathrooms, the plaintiffs appeal, basing their contention on the theory that the bathtubs were properly installed in the first instance, even though they did not comply with the plans and specifications. The bathtubs were simply set upon the wooden joists or wooden bearings, without any concrete base underneath them. A reading of the specifications shows that they called for the entire surface of every bathroom being covered with concrete, and then tile over the concrete, etc., just in accordance with the law relative to the construction of bathrooms, etc.

The record shows that the attention of the contractor was called to the manner in which concrete and tile floors should be laid in the bathrooms, prior to the installation of the tubs. Some of the witnesses called by the plaintiffs testified that the plans and specifications called for the installation of the tubs upon concrete base, and further testified that they would not follow the plans and specifications, but would install the tubs as was done by the contractors in the first instance in this case. We do not very well perceive how the testimony of any witness, that he would not follow the plans and specifications, can be held to relieve the contractors from so doing. An examination of the record, as we have said, shows the manner in which the bathtubs were to be installed. It shows, further, that, in order to make the installation of the bathtubs conform to the plans and specifications and the building laws, it was necessary to take up all the bathtubs and re-lay a portion of the floors in every bathroom, of which there were forty in number, from which it follows that the appeal of the plaintiffs touching this item is without merit.

[13] In view of the fact that the court allowed the appellant the sum of $3,386.52, to which there must be added a considerable sum, as hereinbefore indicated, the finding of the court that the delay of the owner in making the installment payment immediately after February 21, 1924, brought about the filing of the liens against the hotel building, does not appear to be supported. The total amount of the installment is the sum of $11,295, against which there was a sum due the owner for expenses which we have considered in actually completing the building, diminishing the installment payment more than one-half.

It does not logically follow that, because a payment of four or five thousand dollars was withheld, that liens aggregating something over the sum of $33,000 were filed as a consequence. Section 1193, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that contractors shall protect buildings from liens. The record does not show that they had any financial responsibility. What there is in the record is to the effect that they were without credit. Therefore the conclusion that the withholding of the sum above mentioned prevented the contractors from paying off liens aggregating some six times the amount of the money actually owing to the contractors does not appear to be sustained.

The only answer of the respondent to the general item of $1,524.55, compensation claimed for work and labor performed and materials furnished, for which a bill of particulars was furnished, and which the testimony, so far as we have been able to discover, shows to have been work and labor performed upon the building and materials furnished to make the building conform to the plans and specifications, is that the court found that the building had been substantially completed, and specifies some of the defects called "trivial defects" in one of its findings. It is now argued, as we have just stated, that, by reason of substantial performance, the owner should not be compensated for the work just mentioned. The cases which we have cited show that a finding of substantial performance does not estop the owner from recouping the expenses necessarily incurred in bringing the building up to the standard contemplated by the plans and specifications. We may here again refer to 9 C. J. 739, where the law is stated in relation to why the courts have adopted the rule of substantial performance. Connected with that same rule of construction of contracts is a further construction that the owner is entitled to be reimbursed for work and labor performed, notwithstanding the finding of substantial performance. As said in Long Beach, etc., District v. Dodge, 135 Cal. 401, 67 P. 499, the contractors had full knowledge of all and singular the requirements of the plans and specifications and of the work necessary to be done, notwithstanding the substantial performance claimed by them.

Our attention not having been called to any testimony controverting what we have hereinbefore stated, it follows that the owner was entitled to be fully reimbursed for all the sums shown by the testimony to have been expended by him in perfecting the building as called for by the plans and specifications.

No damages were allowed the plaintiffs for and on account of the withholding of payments for the limited periods mentioned in the complaint, other than the sum of $186.99 as interest, from which it follows that it is illogical to conclude that the withholding of payments for the short periods mentioned induced the filing of liens in a sum slightly in excess of $33,000. The consolidation of cases mentioned in the beginning of this opinion included the Globe Indemnity Company as cross-defendant, and also actions begun by the Stockton Supply Company, J. R. Bickel, and J. M. Adams, based upon mechanics' liens filed against the hotel building. The questions involved as to these parties relate to the judgment charging the owner with interest on the liens, charging his property with the amount of the liens, including interest, irrespective of the sums due the contractor on account of the building contract, and also failing to allow the owner recourse against the bonding company.

Did the court err in providing that the owner should not have recourse against the bonding company for any excess that he would be required to pay in order to clear his property from any mechanics' liens thereon in excess of the amount due the contractors?

The court made no finding that the Globe Indemnity Company had been in any particular disadvantaged or that that its liability upon its bond had been increased by any act of the owner. The only item of damages which we have found under the law and the testimony charged to the owner is the sum of $186.99 allowed as interest on deferred payments. This burden, however, is cast upon the owner and not upon the bonding company. The instrument by which the bonding company insured the completion of the building expressly refers to the contract, and, under the contract, as we have seen, the contractors were entitled to an extension of time if any delay in the progress of the work was caused by the owner. This extension of time was claimed, and, while the contractors claimed that they were damaged, no tenable testimony was introduced upon which any finding of damages could be supported. The estimate was too vague and uncertain.

This, taken in connection with what we have heretofore stated, we think shows conclusively that the liability of the bonding company has in nowise been increased by any act of the owner. While the court found that the building was substantially completed, the fact remains that the owner was compelled to pay out the sum of $7,284.80 to bring the building up to the plans and specifications, and to make it fit for its intended use.

[14, 15] Appellant strongly contends that the court is in error in finding substantial compliance, and in holding that only trivial defects remained to be remedied. There is much merit in this contention, but courts of equity have adopted a rule giving a very liberal construction to such contracts in order that the contractor may be paid for the work actually performed, and the owner reimbursed or entitled to an offset on the contract in the full amount of the money necessary to be expended by him to complete the building according to the plans and specifications. The applying of this principle was largely within the discretion of the trial court, and, by reason of what is hereinafter said, we do not feel that the circumstances demand a reversal of the judgment on account of such holding.

[16] The Globe Indemnity Company was a surety for compensation, and therefore does not stand before the court as a "favorite of the law," as is the case with a voluntary surety, and the strict rule ordinarily applied to private voluntary sureties does not apply to this case. Royal Indemnity Co. of New York v. Northern Granite & Stone Co., 100 Ohio St. 373, 126 N. E. 405, 12 A. L. R. 378, and the annotations found in A. L. R. In the annotations on page 389 it is said: "While an individual surety's contract must be construed strictly in his favor, that of a surety company given for the faithful performance of a building contract, will not be construed so as to release it because of a variance in the performance of the contract, unless it is shown that the variance substantially increased the chances of loss insured against"—citing a long list of cases.

The same rule is enunciated in the consolidated cases of Montpelier v. National Surety Co. and City of Montpelier v. National Surety Co., 97 Vt. 111, 122 A. 484, 488, 33 A. L. R. 489. We find the following relative to the liability of compensated sureties thus stated: "The rule is well settled that a compensated surety is relieved from its obligations for a departure from the contract only when the departure is shown to be material and prejudicial." Supporting this statement, the court cites on page 496 of 33 A. L. R., supra, a large number of cases, and then says: "This doctrine is sometimes referred to as a modern rule, but it is merely the application of old principles to the new situation in suretyship matters, due to the advent of bonding or surety companies, whose business, while in form that of suretyship, is essentially that of insurance. Their contracts are regarded as contracts of indemnity, and as such, are governed by the rules of construction applicable to contracts of insurance." See, also Maryland Casualty Co. v. E. W. Fowler et al. (C. C. A.) 31 F.(2d) 881, 63 A. L. R. 1375.

[17] In line with these decisions and the principles applicable to surety companies who insure only for compensation, it must be held that that portion of the judgment denying recourse of the owner against the Globe Indemnity Company must be stricken therefrom and a provision inserted therein giving the owner a right to recover for any excess over the contract price which he may be compelled to pay.

While under the provisions of the fourth paragraph of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, the court did not limit the right of recovery of the lienholders to the amount that might be found due upon the contract from the owner to the contractor, yet, reading that section with section 1193, Code of Civil Procedure, the owner is really chargeable only with the amount of the unpaid construction price as we have determined the same herein, being the balance due the contractors, less the sum necessarily expended by the owner to complete the building, and, if the owner is compelled to pay any sum in excess thereof, recourse is given him against the contractors, or, in this case, the contractors' sureties.

[18] In its findings and judgment the court allowed interest to the respective lien claimants from the time of the filing of their liens until the date of judgment. This was error. The record shows that the three lien claimants held unliquidated demands, and that they were not entitled to the sums claimed by them, and that the amount could only be determined by the judgment of the court. Lien claimant Adams claimed the sum of $347.60, and was allowed $298.26. The Stockton Plumbing Company claimed the sum of $7,750, and was allowed only the sum of $4,855.48, and lien claimant Bickel asked $6,334.50, and was allowed $5,818.50.

[19] Dealing with a similar question the court, in Burnett v. Glas, 154 Cal. 249, 97 P. 423, 427, used the following language: "We are of the opinion that the claim of appellants that claimants Dyer and Watkins & Thurman were not entitled to interest prior to judgment is well founded. As to each of these claims, the amount due was unliquidated and not capable of being made certain by calculation until fixed by the judgment. The rule applied to such claims in Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 58 P. 312, namely, that interest prior to judgment cannot be allowed, was applicable. See, also, Stimson v. Dunham, etc., 146 Cal. 285, 79 P. 968. The judgment must be modified in this respect." We have found no rule contrary to the rule just set forth. From which it follows that the allowance of interest to the lien claimants as against the owner must be stricken from the judgment. At the same time it is due all parties to state that the judgment of the trial court awarded the lien claimants the interest just referred to, as against the Globe Indemnity Company, and as the Globe Indemnity Company has taken no appeal from the judgment, the judgment will not be modified so as to prevent the lien claimants from collecting such interest from the Globe Indemnity Company.

[20] Appellant further cites the cases of Stone v. Siermian, 198 Cal. 520, 246 P. 45, Roberts v. Security T. & S. Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673, and Bowman v. Maryland Casualty Co., 88 Cal. App. 481, 263 P. 826, to the effect that it is the duty of the contractors to protect the property from lien claimants, to defend such suits, if any, and that, if the owner is compelled to defend such suits, he is entitled to recover costs of suits and attorney's fees paid in making such defense. While the law is plain, as contended for by the appellant, the record in this case shows that the owner was compelled to litigate, as against the contractors, practically all of the issues involved in the lien cases, and there is nothing in the record which would enable this court to apportion the costs, nor is there any basis upon which we could fix that portion of counsel fees that might properly be chargeable to the different claims set up by the holders of liens, and by reason of these facts we cannot say that this case presents a situation where the attorney's fees were really enhanced to any considerable extent by reason of the lien cases which were consolidated with the main case.

While the appellant claims damages for delay on the ground that the plaintiffs did not complete the building according to the plans and specifications, we have found nothing in the record upon which we could base any finding or judgment thereon as to the extent of the delay, and reversal should not be had for such reasons.

[21] Was the defendant entitled to costs in the court below?

The following figures have been computed according to our conclusions as hereinbefore set forth, which answer this question in the negative, to wit: At the date of the entry of judgment, there was due as principal on the contract the sum of $7,423.18; as interest, $4,438.86; allowance for extras including the $186.99 interest on deferred payments aggregate the total sum due the contractors of $12,570.68; due lien claimants at the date of the entry of judgment, chargeable against the owner, or which the owner might have paid, offsetting the plaintiff's claims, the sum of $10,972.24; leaving a balance due the contractors of $1,598.44, which entitle the contractors to their costs.

As this action has involved an immense amount of labor and a great deal of expense, instead of ordering a new trial, we will, in pursuance of section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, and the constitutional provision relating thereto (Const. art. 6, § 4¾), direct only a modification of the judgment.

It is therefore ordered that the sum of $22,794.15 adjudged to be due the plaintiffs from the defendant Covell be stricken from the judgment, and the figures $12,570.68 be inserted in lieu thereof.

It is further ordered that the allowance of interest to lien claimants as against the owner, from the date of the filing of the liens until the entry of judgment, be stricken therefrom.

It is further ordered that, wherever the language of the judgment provides that whenever the owner pays any lien or liens in excess of the sum found to be due the contractors, the owner shall not be subrogated to the rights of the lien or lienholders as against the Globe Indemnity Company, be stricken therefrom, and the following inserted: "Provided, that if the owner pays any lien or liens, in excess of the sum found due from the owner to the contractors, then and in that case the owner shall be, and he is hereby subrogated to the rights of such lien or lienholders against the Globe Indemnity Company."

It is further ordered that that portion of the judgment providing that, if the Globe Indemnity Company shall pay or satisfy any judgment in favor of the Stockton Supply Company, J. R. Bickel, or J. M. Adams, or any thereof, then the Globe Indemnity Company shall be subrogated forthwith to all the rights of such judgment creditors so paid and discharged by it, be modified by adding thereto the following: "Provided that such recourse against the owner shall not extend to any sum in excess of the amount heretofore found due the plaintiffs as contractors."

It is further ordered that the allowance of costs for the Globe Indemnity Company be stricken from the judgment.

It is further ordered that the judgment in favor of Covell, in so far as it relates to the costs and expenses of reinstalling bathtubs, and from which the plaintiffs have appealed, be affirmed.

It is further ordered that the judgment in favor of the plaintiffs and in favor of the lienholders stand affirmed as modified herein.

The appellant Covell is awarded his costs on appeal.

GREAT NORTHERN RY. CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MODOC COUNTY et al.

Civ. 4676.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 4, 1932.

1. Eminent domain ⇐169.

Logging company's mere lack of title to easement for track across railroad right of way does not exempt it from regulation by railroad commission (Const. art. 1, § 14).

2. Eminent domain ⇐169.

Allegations of logging company's complaint, in suit to condemn easement for track across railroad right of way, held sufficient to establish plaintiff's status as common carrier, subject to regulation by railroad commission (Const. art. 1, § 14).

The complaint alleged defendant railway company's incorporation and owner-ership and operation of railroad and necessary equipment for transportation of passengers and freight in state, route of its tracks through county, and plaintiff's incorporation, engagement in logging and lumber business in state, right of way for railway tracks in county, and desire to acquire easement therefor across defendant's right of way at described point in county.

3. Eminent domain ⇐169.

Procurement of railroad commission's order, determining location and conditions incident to crossing of railroad right of way by logging company's tracks, held prerequisite to proceeding to condemn easement therefor (Const. art. 1, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. § 1238; St. 1915, p. 137, § 43, subd. b, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1215).

4. Eminent domain ⇐169.

Railroad commission has jurisdiction to hear logging company's application to condemn easement for tracks across railroad right of way, where taking of private individual's property is not involved (Const. art. 12, § 23a; St. 1915, p. 137, § 43, subds. b, c, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1215).

Application by the Great Northern Railway Company for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Modoc and F. M. Jamison, Judge thereof.

Writ granted, and court directed to dismiss action.

Earl & Hall and Chaffee E. Hall, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

W. C. Van Emon, of Klamath Falls, Or., and A. K. Wylie, of Alturas, for respondents.

Mr. Presiding Justice PRESTON delivered the opinion of the court.

The petitioner seeks to prohibit the Superior Court of Modoc County from proceeding to try an action in eminent domain which was instituted by the Tionesta Logging Railway Company to condemn an easement to be used for a crossing of the track of the Great Northern Railway Company. It is asserted the court lacks jurisdiction to try the condemnation suit for the reason that the order of the railroad commission was not first procured determining the location and conditions incident to the crossing as required by section 43 subdivision (b) of the Public Utilities Act of California (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1215). A motion to dismiss the action on that ground was denied.

The complaint in the condemnation suit alleges the incorporation of the Great Northern Railway Company and that it owns and operates a railroad and necessary equipment for the transportation of passengers and freight in California. The route of this railroad track through Modoc county is described. It is also alleged the Tionesta Logging Railway Company is incorporated and is engaged in a logging and lumber business in the state of California and possesses a right of way for its railway track in Modoc county; that it is desirous of acquiring an easement for its railroad track to cross the right of way of the Great Northern Railway Company in Modoc county at a point which is particularly described to be used in common with the last-mentioned company. The complaint recites the necessary elements of an ordinary condemnation suit, except that it is not alleged that the order of the railroad commission was first procured consenting to the crossing or determining its location or the conditions incident thereto. The defendant's motion to dismiss the condemnation suit for lack of jurisdiction was denied. This petition for a writ of prohibition was then instituted.

The only question which is involved in this proceeding is whether the Superior Court is without jurisdiction to try the condemnation suit until the railroad commission first determines the location and conditions incident to the proposed crossing and authorizes the same, as provided by subdivision (b) of section 43 of the Public Utilities Act of California.

Section 1238 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that: "The right of eminent domain may be exercised in behalf of the following public uses: * * * 11. Railroads, roads and flumes for quarrying, logging or lumbering purposes."

[1-3] The Tionesta Logging Railway Company contends it is entitled under the provisions of article 1, § 14, of the Constitution of California, to maintain an action in eminent domain in the Superior Court of the county where the land is located, to condemn an easement for its railroad to cross the petitioner's track, and have the damages incident thereto assessed by the court or a jury, subject to a subsequent authorization therefor and order of the railroad commission determining the location and conditions attending the proposed crossing pursuant to subdivision (b) of section 43 of the Public Utilities Act of California.

The logging company further asserts that it does not become a common carrier subject to the regulation of the railroad commission until it has acquired the property for its right of way and a decree of condemnation therefor has been duly made and entered. This claim is based upon the last paragraph of section 14 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides: "The taking of private property for a railroad * * * for logging or lumbering purposes shall be deemed a taking for a public use, and any person, firm, company or corporation taking private property under the law of eminent domain for such purposes shall thereupon and thereby become a common carrier."

It will be observed, however, that the taking of private property in eminent domain for a railroad right of way is not involved in this proceeding. We must assume the logging company is possessed of a right of way and that it is an incorporated logging railway company. All that is involved in this proceeding is the privilege of procuring an easement for one railroad track to cross the right of way of another railroad. We are of the opinion that the desired easement for a railroad crossing is a mere incident to the property rights of the logging railway company, and that the mere lack of title to this easement does not exempt the logging company from regulation by the railroad commission. The allegations of the complaint in the condemnation suit, and of the petition in this proceeding, are sufficient to constitute it a common carrier. It is only necessary that it should be equipped so as to be able to transport passengers or property, to be deemed to be a common carrier. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the courts still retain concurrent jurisdiction of eminent domain proceedings to condemn an easement for one railroad to cross the track of another railroad, where merely public utility property is taken as distinguished from property of a private individual, still we are of the opinion that the procuring of an order of the railroad commission pursuant to subdivision (b), section 43, of the Public Utilities Act, determining the location and conditions incident to the proposed crossing, is a prerequisite to the right to maintain such eminent domain proceeding.

Certainly orderly procedure and justice would seem to demand that the order of the railroad commission consenting to the crossing determining the exact location and fixing the terms and conditions incident to the grant should become a prerequisite to the maintaining of an action in the state courts to condemn the easement for railroad crossing purposes. For instance, it is apparent that since the commission has the exclusive power to locate the point of crossing and determine the manner, terms, and conditions incident to the crossing, it might become unjust and idle to first condemn a particular strip of land as a crossing or attempt to fix the compensation therefor. It is entirely possible the commission in the exercise of wise discretion may subsequently determine, in the interest of justice, that an entirely different location of the proposed crossing from that which was condemned, is least detrimental to the owner and best adapted to the interest of both parties. The commission may, in the exercise of justice, determine that the best interest of the public and of the parties involved demand an overhead or an under track crossing. Other reasonable terms and conditions may be imposed by the commission which were not contemplated in the awarding of compensation at the trial. Such contrary action on the part of the commission would result in nullifying the decree of condemnation. The expense and time of trial would become useless.

[4] Moreover, under the provisions of article 12, § 23a, of the Constitution, and subdivisions (b) and (c) of section 43 of the Public Utilities Act (as amended by St. 1927, p. 1215), the railroad commission has jurisdiction to authorize one railroad to cross the tracks of another railroad, to determine the location of such crossing and the terms and conditions incident thereto, and to assess the compensation to be paid for the taking of any property of a public utility for such purpose, and to make the final order of condemnation therefor.

Article 12, § 23a, of the Constitution provides: "The railroad commission shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction as shall be conferred upon it by the legislature to fix the just compensation to be paid for the taking of any property of a public utility in eminent domain proceedings by the state or any county, city and county, incorporated city or town, municipal water district, irrigation district or other public corporation or district, and the right of the legislature to confer such powers upon the railroad commission is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

Pursuant to this authorization of the Constitution, subdivision (b) of section 43 of the Public Utilities Act was enacted, which reads in part: "The commission shall have the exclusive power to determine and prescribe the manner, including the particular point of crossing, and the terms of installation, operation, maintenance, use and protection of each crossing of one railroad by another railroad * * * and to require, where in its judgment it would be practicable, a separation of grades at any such crossing heretofore or hereafter established and to prescribe the terms upon which such separation shall be made and the proportions in which the expense of the construction, alteration, relocation or abolition of such crossings or the separation of such grades shall be divided."

Subdivision (c) of the same section of the Public Utilities Act provides: "The commission shall have power in accordance with the procedure provided in this subsection to fix the just compensation to be paid for property or any interest in or to property to be taken or damaged in the separation of grades at any crossing specified in subsection (b) hereof, or for property or any interest in or to property to be taken or damaged in the construction, alteration or relocation, under the order or with the approval of the commission, * * * and upon the payment of the just compensation so fixed to make a final order of condemnation as hereinafter provided."

From the foregoing enactments of law it seems clear that where the mere acquiring of an easement for one railroad track to cross the right of way of another railroad is involved, which amounts to the taking of an interest only in the property of a public utility as distinguished from the property of a private individual, the railroad commission has jurisdiction to hear the proceeding for condemnation, and grant or deny the application, determine the location and fix the terms and conditions incident to the proposed crossing, award the compensation to be paid for the taking of the property of a public utility, and make and enter the final order of condemnation therefor.

Chase Lumber Company v. Railroad Commission, 212 Cal. 691, 706, 300 P. 12, 18, upon which the respondent relies, does hold that: "The Railroad Commission has no power to make or direct the execution of any order under * * * sections 22, 23, and 23a of article 12 of the state Constitution or of section 43, subd. a, of the Public Utilities Act, which shall either by its terms provide for, or by the execution thereof, effectuate the taking or damage of the private property of private persons otherwise than under the provisions of section 14 of article 1 of the state Constitution, or which shall provide for or effectuate the taking or damage of such private property without compensation."

In the Chase Lumber Company Case, which was decided by a divided court, the property of private individuals was directly affected by the proposed crossing of a city street by a railroad track. In granting the petition for a writ of prohibition which was instituted by private owners of private property adjacent to the proposed crossing, the court appears to have carefully limited the jurisdiction of the court in such eminent domain proceedings to the taking or damaging of "private property of private persons." Upon the contrary, it will be observed that section 23a of article 12 of the Constitution confers jurisdiction upon the railroad commission to award compensation "for the taking of any property of a public utility." This provision is declared to be plenary and unlimited by any other provision of the Constitution. If the language of the Chase Lumber Company Case is enlarged to apply to the taking of all property of public utilities as well as the property of private persons, then the last-mentioned section of the Constitution is meaningless and ineffectual for any purpose.

Regardless of whether the railroad commission is possessed of jurisdiction to condemn an easement for one railroad track to cross the right of way of another railroad and award the compensation therefor, it still remains true that the commission has the exclusive power to determine the location and fix the terms and conditions of the proposed crossing. We are of the opinion this action on the part of the commission should become a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action in a state court to condemn an easement for one railroad track to cross the right of way of another railroad.

The impossibility of appraising damages prior to the determination of the location, terms, and conditions upon which a railroad was authorized to cross a public street was recognized in Re West 134th Street, 204 N. Y. 465, 97 N. E. 862, 864, where it was said: "It is important that the commissioners of estimate and assessment should be advised in advance of the nature and character of the interests of the railroad company to be taken in order to determine the damages that should be awarded to it. If the street is to cross under or above the railroad tracks, a very different question may be presented from that where the street is to cross the tracks at grade. If they cross at grade, the easement of the railroad company in the operation of its trains may be more seriously affected than by an under or over crossing. The power to determine this question was then vested in the board of railroad commissioners, now in the public service commission, and in our view the statute contemplated the determination of that question by that commission before the city should proceed to appraise the property interests of the railroad corporation and acquire title for the crossing."

The foregoing language seems very appropriate to the situation in the present proceeding, provided the court retains any jurisdiction of the condemnation suit whatever under the circumstances which are here presented.

Under a Missouri statute similar to the Public Utilities Act of California, in the case of City of Kirksville v. Hines, 285 Mo. 233, 225 S. W. 950, 951, it was determined that a city could not condemn land for a street to cross a railroad track until the public service commission had first determined the location of the crossing and the terms and conditions thereof. The court there said: "The petition does not allege that such parcel of land is the locus of the particular point of crossing of the crossing of defendants' railroad by the proposed street extension as determined by the Public Service Commission. If a municipality has no authority to determine the place of the crossing of a railroad by a street that it proposes to open or extend, obviously it cannot appropriate land for such a crossing unless and until the situs is determined by the tribunal invested with the power so to do. Such prior determination is therefore a condition precedent to the right to condemn. As it nowhere appears from the petition that the land therein described and which is sought to be condemned is at a place that has been determined upon and fixed by the Public Service Commission as the point of crossing of the railroad by the proposed street extension, the petition does not state a cause of action."

The complaint in eminent domain which is involved in the present proceeding failed to state that the railroad commission had authorized the proposed crossing or designated its location. The complaint therefore failed to state a cause of action. The Superior Court is without jurisdiction to try the eminent domain cause.

The writ of prohibition is granted as prayed for. The court is directed to dismiss the action.

SCHROEDER v. WHEELER.

Civ. 7819.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 27, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Action ⇐6.

Complaint by patent attorney upon contract to prosecute client's patent applications and protect client against infringements by employing counsel when necessary stated cause of action for declaratory relief (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1060–1062a).

Such complaint stated a cause of action for declaratory relief under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1060–1062a, and was not subject to the objection that, although in form it was an action for declaratory relief, it was an attempt to seek specific performance of a contract for professional services under the guise of an action for declaratory relief.

2. Contracts ⇐143.

Contract must be interpreted in entirety.

3. Contracts ⇐153.

Where possible, contract should be interpreted to sustain its validity (Civ. Code, § 3541).

4. Attorney and client ⇐11.

Patent attorney's contract to protect client's interest by employing counsel when necessary and prosecuting infringement suit held not illegal as agreement to "practice law," where patent attorney was not an attorney at law.

The term "practice of law" is generally understood as the performing services in a court of justice in any matter depending therein, throughout its various stages, and in conformity to the adopted rules of procedure; but in a larger sense it includes legal advice and counsel and the preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured, although such matter may or may not be depending in a court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Practice of Law," see Words and Phrases.]

5. Attorney and client ⇐11.

In patent attorney's action on contract to prosecute patent applications and defend client's interest against infringements, evidence held to show client knew patent attorney was not attorney at law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; James G. Quinn, Judge.

Action by Harry C. Schroeder against Maude Agnes Mingus Wheeler, doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Lavalon Laboratories. From the judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

John H. Miller, A. W. Boyken, and N. D. Thomas, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Norman J. Ronald, Walter M. Gleason, and George W. Hickman, all of Oakland, for respondent.

LANDIS, Justice pro tem.

The following are the facts as stated in appellant's brief and appear to substantially cover the controlling facts, to wit:

The defendant, Maude Agnes Mingus Wheeler, was the inventor and manufacturer of a composition hair rinse known as Lavalon Rinsing Powder. Desiring to obtain protection for her invention and for the name "Lavalon," she filed in the United States Patent Office two applications, one for a patent on the hair rinse and the other for a trade-mark on the aforesaid name, which trade-mark later became involved in an opposition proceeding. Both of these applications were filed through the plaintiff, Harry C. Schroeder, a registered patent attorney, who has been engaged in that profession in Oakland, Cal., approximately twenty years. During all of the time Schroeder had dealings with defendant, he had associated with him, as an employee, Adelbert Schapp, an attorney at law, admitted to practice in all the courts of California, who was a registered patent attorney as well.

It became necessary for defendant to file additional applications in the Patent Office to protect her interests adequately and to enable her to take legal proceedings if her rights should be invaded by infringers. She was not financially able to compensate Schroeder for his services as a patent attorney. A contract was therefore made in writing between plaintiff and defendant, by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to file and prosecute all patent and trade-mark applications for defendant and protect defendant against infringement and unfair competition "by employing counsel when necessary." In consideration of these covenants the defendant agreed to compensate plaintiff in an amount equal to 5 per cent. of the gross income from her "Lavalon" business. This contract was entered into on May 21, 1926, and was to continue in force for a period of ten years.

On August 5, 1927, the defendant ceased to make payments under the contract and on October 10, 1927, wrote a letter to plaintiff purporting to terminate and cancel the same. Thereupon plaintiff filed his complaint, alleging that he was ready, competent, willing, and able to perform the services required of him under the contract; that defendant had failed and refused to pay him the compensation reserved in the agreement, except the sum of $555.28; and, in an amended complaint, alleged that there was due him a sum in excess of $2,500. He prayed for an adjudication of the rights of the parties under the contract and for an accounting.

In the answer, defendant, after a denial of paragraphs IV and V of the complaint, set up as a separate defense that the contract called for the services of an attorney at law, and that performance on his part was therefore impossible. As a further separate defense, the answer alleged default on the part of plaintiff in protecting defendant against the infringement of S. Hikell & Co., of Omaha, Neb., thereby giving defendant the right to terminate the contract.

Upon the original trial of the action, the court directed findings in favor of the plaintiff, subsequently reopened the case for further trial, and after the further trial of the case made its findings and caused judgment to be entered for defendant, and this appeal is by plaintiff from said judgment.

Appellant contends that the following six findings are contrary to the evidence, and that they thus constitute the issues of this appeal, to wit: The finding "that under and by virtue of the terms and promises of said written contract, plaintiff also promised and agreed to and in fact did perform certain services of an attorney-at-law"; the finding "that at the time of entering into said contract defendant did not know that plaintiff was not an attorney-at-law"; the finding "that it is not true that plaintiff has at all times or at any time, or at all, been ready and/or competent and/or willing and/or able to perform each and/or every, and/or all and/or singular the services and/or any part or portion of the services specified and/or required of him under the terms of the said agreement and that it is not true that plaintiff has performed all and/or any services thereunder required and/or requested by defendant"; the finding "that plaintiff failed, refused and neglected to perform for defendant any of the services so agreed by him to be performed except that plaintiff did procure for defendant not to exceed six patents, and in this respect the court finds that defendant paid to plaintiff therefor the sum of Five Hundred and Fifty-five and 28/100 ($555.28) Dollars, and that plaintiff has been fully compensated therefor"; the finding "that it is not true there is now and/or that there was at any time, or at all, due to plaintiff from defendant, a sum in excess of Twenty-five Hundred Dollars, or any sum or sums whatever"; the finding "that defendant performed each and every all and singular the promises, covenants and agreements in said contract by her agreed to be performed."

For the purpose of simplifying the discussion, appellant groups said findings into the following questions: (1) Did plaintiff agree to perform and did he in fact perform the services of an attorney at law? (2) Did defendant know plaintiff was not an attorney at law? (3) Did plaintiff or defendant violate the terms of the contract? (4) Was plaintiff fully compensated for the services performed by him under the contract?

Defendant does not appear to seriously urge that plaintiff acted in the capacity of a lawyer, whereas he was only a patent attorney, but appears to take the position that the contract itself provides for the services of a lawyer, and that plaintiff could not fill that requirement, and contends that plaintiff agreed to perform for defendant certain personal services which fall into two distinct classes, to wit, (a) Services usually and customarily performed by registered patent attorneys, and (b) services usually and customarily performed exclusively by attorneys at law; and that the real question involved herein is whether or not a patent attorney, who is not an attorney at law, may enforce a contract under which he undertakes and agrees to prosecute and defend, or causes to be prosecuted and defended, such actions at law for infringement of patents and unfair competition as in his belief and judgment shall be beneficial to his client, and that the action is one wherein the plaintiff, as a registered patent attorney who is not an attorney at law, seeks to have adjudicated his rights with reference to a written contract of employment; and, although in form it is an action for declaratory relief under the provisions of sections 1060 to 1062a of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is an attempt by plaintiff to seek specific performance of a contract for professional services under the guise of an action for declaratory relief, and that the complaint does not state a cause of action.

[1] With respect to the contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, we need but cite the case of Blakeslee v. Wilson, 190 Cal. 479, 213 P. 495, the decision of which is applicable to and determinative of the question here presented, and clearly shows that this contention is not well taken. See, also, Lane Mortgage Co. v. Crenshaw, 93 Cal. App. 411, 269 P. 672; Oldham v. Moodie, 94 Cal. App. 88, 270 P. 688; 8 Cal. Law Review, 133; 9 Cal. Law Review, 359; and 10 Cal. Law Review, 158.

Defendant further contends that the contract is illegal and void, and in support thereof urges the following points: (a) Plaintiff is not an attorney at law; (b) definition of the term "practicing law"; (c) by the terms of the contract plaintiff undertook to practice law; (d) one who is not an attorney at law cannot practice law; (e) one who is not an attorney at law cannot recover compensation for legal services; and (f) the contract is entire and not severable. Plaintiff admits points (a), (d), (e), and (f), leaving only points (b) and (c) to be considered.

Constituting the material parts of the contract necessary for a consideration of the issues to be determined by the court, and after in effect reciting that defendant is in the business of manufacturing a hair rinse which is being sold on the market under the name Lavalon Rinsing Powder; that she has an application pending in the United States Patent Office for letters patent on the composition of said rinse powder and contemplates filing further applications for letters patent on changes and improvements she may make from time to time; that she has adopted and is using the word "Lavalon" as a trade-mark and has filed application in said United States Patent Office for registration of said trade-mark; that she is building up a substantial trade on said rinse powder, with a limited capital; that she is selling said powder in distinctive packages and with distinctive literature which have become well known to the trade; that an attempt is being made by S. Hikell & Co., of Omaha, Neb., to place a similar powder on the market in substantially the same package for the purpose of deceiving the purchasing public; that it is likely that other firms may adopt similar measures in the future, and that it will be necessary for defendant to take measures continually for the protection of her patent rights, trade-marks, and the identity of her goods; that plaintiff is a registered patent attorney and is now prosecuting defendant's patent application and trade-mark application and certain opposition in connection therewith, and will file further patent applications as the same may become necessary, and is ready to protect the legal interests of defendant wherever the same may be invaded, by employing counsel when necessary for commencing and prosecuting infringement suit or suits for unfair competition; that defendant is not financially able at the present time to properly compensate plaintiff for services to be performed—the contract recites that defendant hereby retains said plaintiff as attorney for the purpose of filing and prosecuting patent and trade-mark applications and for protecting defendant against infringement and unfair competition for the period of ten years, the employment to be continued thereafter at the option of either party, and defendant agrees to pay plaintiff, as consideration for such services, a retainer equal to 5 per cent. of the gross income of said business, to be paid on the 15th day of each month for the gross receipts of the preceding month; that plaintiff hereby accepts the employment as attorney for defendant and agrees to protect the interests of defendant against infringement and unfair competition with all reasonable care and to the best of his ability, to prepare and prosecute applications for patent and trade-mark protection wherever in the judgment of plaintiff the filing of such applications will advance the interests of defendant and where the expense involved is not out of proportion to the retainer received, and he further agrees to defend defendant or cause her to be defended when any suit or action is brought against her for infringement of any patent rights or trade-marks or for unfair competition; that, if either party should neglect to perform the obligations assumed in this contract, the other may terminate by giving notice, etc., provided that the alleged default shall consist of the refusal of plaintiff to bring suit on the instructions of defendant against an alleged infringer or unfair competitor; the question of whether such suit falls within the limits of this contract shall be decided by arbitration; and further provides that the agreement has reference only to the present business of defendant as set forth above and to allied subject within the natural expansion thereof, and that the duties of said plaintiff shall be confined to matters arising out of patent and trade-mark matters and unfair competition.

The parties appear to rely on the plain and ordinary signification of the language of the contract; and in fact the evidence shown by the record, in addition to the contract, is but little, if any help to the court in its determination of the real question to be determined.

With respect to what constitutes "practice of law," in the 1932 supplement of California Jurisprudence, section 6, on page 16 of the article on "The Practice of Law," it is said: "The meaning of the phrase 'practice of law' is too broad to be brought within the limits of a single all-inclusive definition. The courts have adopted many definitions, some of which are only broad enough to cover the specific facts before them in the particular cases, and legislatures have also attempted to define the phrase in the enactment of statutes regulating the practice of law as a whole or prohibiting certain persons from engaging therein. One definition, frequently approved by the California courts, is thus phrased: 'As the term is generally understood the "practice of the law" is the doing or performing services in a court of justice in any matter depending therein, throughout its various stages, and in conformity to the adopted rules of procedure. But in a larger sense it includes legal advice and counsel, and the preparation of legal instruments and contracts by which legal rights are secured, although such matter may or may not be depending in a court.'"

Defendant contends that the plain intent and meaning of the contract is found in the provisions thereof which for convenience in discussing the same will be divided into three paragraphs numbered and hereinafter referred to as paragraphs 1, 2, and 3.

[2, 3] Needless to say, the contract must be interpreted in its entirety and from a consideration of every word, sentence, and phrase, and, if possible, should always be interpreted so as to sustain its validity. In 6 California Jurisprudence, 268, § 168, it is stated as follows: "As between two permissible constructions, that which establishes a valid contract is preferred to that which does not, since it is reasonable to suppose that the parties meant something by their agreement, and were not engaged in an attempt to do a vain and meaningless thing. Pacific Wharf, etc., Co. v. Dredging Co., 184 Cal. 21 [192 P. 847]; McVicker v. McKenzie, 136 Cal. 656 [69 P. 495]; Jackson v. Puget Sound Lumber Co., 123 Cal. 97 [55 P. 788]; Herzog v. Purdy, 119 Cal. 99 [51 P. 27], and others. The parties are deemed to have intended a lawful, rather than an unlawful, act, and their agreement is to be construed, if possible, as intending something for which they had the power to contract. (Smith v. Luning Co., 111 Cal. 308 [43 P. 967].)"

The following is also quoted from 6 California Jurisprudence, 269, § 168, in support of which some fifteen or twenty cases are cited: "All intendments being against fraud and in favor of fair dealing, it will not be presumed against a writing that it contemplated a violation of the law, unless that conclusion becomes irresistible from the very reading of the instrument. (Estate of Wood, 137 Cal. 129 [69 P. 900]). * * * And section 3541, Civil Code, provides that, 'an interpretation which gives effect is preferred to one which makes void.'"

[4] With respect to paragraph 1, which reads as follows: "Agrees to protect the interests of the said Maude Agnes Mingus Wheeler against infringement and unfair competition with all reasonable care and to the best of his ability"—although standing alone it could not mean or import more than an agreement by a patent attorney to use all reasonable care and to the best of his ability protect the interests of defendant against infringement and unfair competition, read and considered in connection with this paragraph found in the contract, to wit, plaintiff "is ready to protect the legal interests of the said Maud Agnes Mingus Wheeler wherever the same may be invaded, by employing counsel when necessary for commencing and prosecuting infringement suit or suits for unfair competition," clearly it cannot be held that under said paragraph 1 plaintiff agreed to practice law. At most, he agreed to employ counsel, when necessary, to perform the services that are required to be performed by an attorney at law. Who, it might be asked, would be better qualified to render the services required than a registered patent attorney admitted to practice before the Patent Office of the United States with all the rights and privileges appertaining thereto, recognized by that office as a specially qualified expert in the field of patents and trade-marks, and endowed with the technical and legal qualifications necessary to render valuable services to clients in that field?

[5] At this point it may be stated that it is obvious that the finding that "defendant did not know that plaintiff was not an attorney at law" is contrary to the irresistible conclusion that must be reached from a consideration of the entire contract and contrary to the evidence.

With respect to paragraph 2, which reads as follows: "To bring suit against infringers and unfair competitors where such suits in the best judgment of the said Harry C. Schroeder will be beneficial to the interests of the said Maud Agnes Mingus Wheeler"—the most that can be said of this paragraph, standing alone, is that plaintiff agreed to bring suits against infringement and unfair competitors where such suits in the best judgment of plaintiff will be beneficial to the best interests of defendant. Defendant in effect contends that under this provision she is deprived of the benefit of counsel and advice of a duly licensed attorney-at-law with respect to the nature and extent of her legal rights, duties, and obligations. A question similar in purport to the question propounded with respect to the provisions of paragraph 1 might be applied here; that is, Who would be better qualified to decide whether or not the bringing of such suits would be beneficial to the interests of defendant than a specially qualified expert in the field of patents and trade-marks? Also it may be noted that the contract in effect provides that, in the event plaintiff shall refuse to bring suit on the instructions of defendant against an alleged infringer or unfair competitor, the question of whether such suit falls reasonably within the limits of this contract shall be decided by a board of arbitration, and in detail provides the manner of bringing about such arbitration. The compliance with this requirement is neither alleged nor proved.

With respect to paragraph 3, which reads as follows: "And he further agrees to defend the said Maud Agnes Mingus Wheeler or cause her to be defended where any suit or action is brought against her for infringement of any Patent rights or Trade Marks or for unfair competition"—it will be seen that plaintiff agrees to defend or cause defendant to be defended where any action or suit is brought against her for infringement or unfair competition. Reading and considering this paragraph in connection with all other paragraphs of the contract forces the conclusion that plaintiff will, if necessary, employ counsel to defend such suit or action.

A consideration of the entire contract forces the irresistible conclusion that, as contended by plaintiff, the intention of the parties was that plaintiff should perform the necessary services as a patent attorney and act as defendant's agent and counselor in looking after her patent and trade-mark matters generally, employing counsel if and when necessary.

The question thus arises as to the legality and the enforceability of such a contract; that is, Can a person who is not an attorney at law enforce a contract under which he agreed to if necessary employ the services of an attorney at law to assist in the performance of services, a portion of which services is to be and may be performed by such person?

As hereinbefore stated, it is conceded by both parties that one who is not an attorney at law not only cannot practice law, but cannot recover compensation for legal services by him performed, but there is no law prohibiting persons other than attorneys from recovering the reasonable value of their services when performed at the request of another. Miller v. Ballerino, 135 Cal. 566, 67 P. 1046, 68 P. 600. In 6 Corpus Juris, page 721, it is stated as follows: "An unlicensed person may recover for services not performed in a court of record, and of a character the performance of which would not constitute the practice of law." See cases therein cited.

Where, as here shown, by solemn contract in writing admitted to have been entered into by and between parties, under the terms of which plaintiff agreed to perform certain services which he was capable of performing and further agreed to furnish the services of an attorney at law if said services should be beneficial and necessary and for and in consideration of which defendant agreed to pay plaintiff on a contingent basis, it cannot be held that the contract is illegal and void; neither is it unenforceable nor impossible of performance. With respect to the contention of defendant that plaintiff failed to perform, particularly urging that plaintiff failed to take steps to protect defendant against the infringement of S. Hikell & Co., in addition to the testimony of defendant admitting her failure and refusal to perform by refusing to make any further payments required under the contract, as hereinbefore stated, it need but be said that it was neither alleged nor proved that the question was submitted to arbitration as required by the plain provisions of the contract.

It is clear that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment decreeing that the contract is a legal contract and is entitled to an accounting.

For the reasons herein given, the judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to proceed in accordance with the views herein expressed.

Reversed, with directions.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, and Bohnett, Hill & Campbell, of San Jose, for respondent.

KNIGHT, J.

At the trial of these consolidated actions to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiffs in an automobile accident, verdicts were rendered against the defendants for the total sum of $3,500, and judgments in conformity therewith were entered by the clerk on the same day. Nine days afterwards Maude I. Weston, one of the defendants, served and filed in each action notice of motion to set aside the judgment and to re-enter the same in her favor, non obstante veredicto; and approximately a month later the trial court granted the motions. From the orders made in that behalf, plaintiffs prosecute these appeals.

[1] Section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from which the trial court derives its authority to hear and determine motions of the kind here granted, provides that "when a motion for a directed verdict, which should have been granted, has been denied and a verdict rendered against the moving party, the court, at any time before the entry of judgment, either of its own motion or on motion of the aggrieved party, shall render judgment in favor of the aggrieved party notwithstanding the verdict * * *" (italics ours), and by recent cases it has been definitely settled that failure to make a motion for a directed verdict during the trial of the action precludes the exercise of the authority granted by said Code section. Cushman v. Cliff House, 79 Cal. App. 572, 250 P. 575; Estate of Yale (Cal. Sup.) 4 P.(2d) 153; Estate of Easton (Cal. App.) 5 P.(2d) 635. In the present cases no motions for directed verdicts were ever made; and it follows, therefore, that the trial court's action in setting aside the judgments against respondent and re-entering the same in her favor non obstante veredicto cannot be sustained.

[2] Respondent points out that prior to the submission of the cases to the jury she proposed an instruction directing a verdict in her favor, and that the trial court refused to give the same, which she contends was the equivalent of presenting a motion for a directed verdict and a denial thereof. The same contention, based on similar facts, was made in the Estate of Easton, supra, decided several months subsequent to the rulings of the trial court in the present actions, and was held to be without merit. The decision in that case was afterwards taken before the Supreme Court on petition for hearing before that court, and the petition was denied.

In the Estate of Easton, also, as here, the record failed to show that the appellant was cognizant of the fact that an instruction for a directed verdict had been proposed; and in this connection respondent calls attention to certain language used in Ramos v. Service Brothers (Cal. App.) 5 P.(2d) 623, decided about the same time the decision in the Estate of Easton was rendered, to the effect that it will be presumed that all instructions proposed by the respective parties were served on each other in conformity with the requirements of section 607a of the Code of Civil Procedure. But whether or not such knowledge be imparted would seem to make little difference, because, as shown, under the ruling of the cases above cited the making of a motion during trial for a directed verdict is a necessary prerequisite to the exercise of the authority granted to the trial court by said section 629.

[3] Moreover, as will be observed, the provisions of said section declare that the authority to enter judgment non obstante veredicto may be exercised at any time before the entry of judgment on the verdict; and here no steps were taken by respondent to invoke the provisions of said section, nor were the motions presented or granted until long after the judgments were entered in accordance with the verdicts; and, to make the rulings effective, it was first necessary to set said judgments aside. Therefore, in any event, the proceedings initiated by respondent's motions were not had within the period of time allowed therefor by said code section.

As claimed by respondent, however, her motions for judgment non obstante veredicto were made in the alternative, as permitted by said Code section, so as to reserve the right to apply for a new trial in the event the motions were denied, and that simultaneously therewith she filed motions for new trial. Therefore the orders appealed from are reversed, with directions to the trial court to re-enter the judgments in favor of plaintiffs in accordance with the verdicts, and thereupon to hear and determine respondent's motions for new trial.

Proceeding by M. Christman as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Leonard J. From the decree directing final distribution of testator's estate, contestant appeals.

John Carfraie Birnie, of San Francisco, for respondents Patrick Doyle and others.

ATTERIDGE, Justice pro tem.

The present appeal is from the final decree of distribution entered in the estate of one Thomas Patrick Doyle, deceased. In the said decree the trial court found and adjudged that the respondents were either directly, or in due course of legal representation, first cousins of the deceased, and as such his next of kin and legal heirs. It also further found that appellant's testator, Leonard J. Meehan, was a second cousin of said Thomas Patrick Doyle, but was not his next of kin nor, under our laws of succession, his next immediate legal heir. Leonard Meehan died shortly after the death of Thomas Patrick Doyle, and his estate is represented here through the appealing administratrix with the will annexed of his estate.

Appellant's main contention on the appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the trial court's finding that respondents were first cousins of Thomas Patrick Doyle, while she is at the same time conceding the correctness of its finding as to the degree of relationship her own testator sustained to the deceased.

[1] Although a resident of San Francisco for a great many years prior to his death on November 3, 1928, Thomas Patrick Doyle appears to have led a secluded and isolated life. He had never married, and during the period of his residence in San Francisco lived with his mother, Mary Ann Meehan Doyle-Edwards, who predeceased him by about three years. Doyle was about seventy-one years of age at the date of his death, and the great majority of the witnesses, giving testimony as to his family pedigree, were persons of greatly advanced years, whose opportunities of acquiring accurate information concerning and memory of the subject matter of their testimony varied widely. As a consequence thereof, the trial court was required to, and we must assume that it did, weigh and balance the testimony of these witnesses in the light of its own inherent strength or infirmities and with due consideration of their bias in favor or prejudices against the interests of the respective claimants to Doyle's estate. Its finding as to the ultimate fact of heirship comes to us fortified by those favorable presumptions in which an appellate court must invariably indulge in favor of the integrity and correctness of the lower court's determination of all matters of fact, and which in fine require that: "If there is any evidence in the record, or any reasonable inference to be drawn from such evidence, to sustain the findings of the trial court they cannot be disturbed here." Kienlen v. Holt, 106 Cal. App. 135–140, 288 P. 866, 868. This fundamental rule of appellate practice applies with equal force to determinations of heirship. Estate of Walden, 166 Cal. 446, 137 P. 35.

From our review of the record, we find that there was evidence before the trial court from which it could and did infer the following matters and circumstances entering into its final determination of ultimate fact:

Thomas Patrick Doyle was the only child of Patrick Henry Doyle and Mary Ann Doyle-Edwards, née Mary Ann Meehan. He was born in New York July 12, 1857. Respondents offered evidence tending to prove that they are the children of the deceased sisters and brother of the father of Thomas Patrick Doyle, and therefore the first cousins of the latter. It will be noted that their claim of heirship is upon the paternal side of Thomas Patrick Doyle's ancestry. Appellant, on the other hand, traces her testator's heirship on the maternal side of said Doyle's ancestry, in that he was the grandson of Patrick Meehan, who was the brother of Mary Ann Meehan Doyle, mother of Thomas Patrick Doyle. He was therefore a second cousin of the instant decedent and one degree further removed from him in kinship than are the respondents.

The evidence tending to establish the relationships described in the preceding paragraph came from sources of approximately equal dignity, and as such was entitled to equal consideration at the hands of the trial court, whose exclusive duty it was to reconcile any and all conflicts and discrepancies that might exist therein. It is, however, the claim and theory of appellant, strenuously urged at the trial, and on this appeal, that Patrick Henry Doyle, the father of Thomas Patrick Doyle, was an only child, and consequently as such would not have had any brothers and sisters through whom respondents could establish or maintain their asserted relationship to the deceased. This claim and theory, however, is based almost entirely upon certain alleged declarations, alleged to have been independently made some years prior to their respective deaths, by the said Thomas Patrick Doyle and his said mother, Mary Doyle-Edwards, which are of the tenor and to the effect that their father and husband, respectively, said Patrick Henry Doyle, had been an "only child," and that Thomas Patrick Doyle "had no living relations on his father's side." Opposed to the testimony of the alleged declarations of those deceased persons were the depositions of a number of witnesses residing in Ireland, who definitely testified that Patrick (Henry) Doyle had one brother and three sisters, and that the present respondents are the surviving children of his said brother and sisters. It should be noted in passing that Patrick Henry Doyle was concededly born in Ireland, while his wife Mary Ann Meehan (mother of Thomas Patrick Doyle) was born in England, and that both emigrated to America at least as early as 1854, for they intermarried in New York City in that year. The trial court might well believe and conclude that these witnesses in Ireland were in at least as good, if not a superior, position to know the facts of Thomas Patrick Doyle's ancestry on his father's side as were any of the witnesses produced on behalf of appellant. Moreover, these witnesses displayed a knowledge of the facts relating to the matter of birth, family history, marriage to Mary Ann Meehan, emigration to America, subsequent movements in this country, and of the eventual death of the said Patrick (Henry) Doyle, to a degree so sufficiently intimate as to at once insure that the identity of the Patrick Doyle to whom their testimony related was one with the self-same Patrick Henry Doyle, who appellant herself concedes and claims was the father of Thomas Patrick Doyle. If the actual fact as to this identity of person were to be found otherwise than in accordance with the testimony of these witnesses (resident in Ireland), the only possible basis for so finding would have to be upon the assumption that they acquired the information of which they thus testified at a time subsequent to Thomas Patrick Doyle's death, and then detailed it in evidence for the base purpose of establishing heirship in favor of strangers to his blood. But the correctness of their narratives with respect to the events and details of which these witnesses testify, their apparent good standing in their respective communities, and their ability to withstand cross-examination were, among other things, potent factors tending to wholly disprove so maleficient an assumption. Irrespective of these considerations, the trial court impliedly found in favor of the probity of these witnesses, and, under the familiar elementary rule earlier herein enunciated, we could not, were we so disposed, displace its favorable finding with any adverse views of our own.

Appellant in attacking said finding also stresses upon the circumstances that the witnesses in Ireland invariably referred to the father of Thomas Patrick Doyle as Patrick Doyle, whereas in some of the exhibits and by some of her own witnesses the said parent is usually identified by the more extensive name of Patrick Henry Doyle, and she thereby seeks to enforce the implication that the two groups of witnesses could not have been referring to the same individual. This circumstance was by no means of controlling importance upon the question of identity. Many persons are known by one of their given and legal names almost to the exclusion of the other.

A similar claim of misidentity, urged by appellant, arises out of the fact that one of her evidentiary exhibits refers to the maiden name of Thomas Patrick Doyle's paternal grandmother as "Ann Goss," whereas the data having its origin in Ireland merely refers to her as "Bridget Doyle." Aside from the fact that the exhibit in question merely records the answer of the declarant to an inquiry of a bank employee, and was therefore likely to be only as complete or accurate as was the information or belief possessed by the declarant on the subject, this recital in this exhibit was by no means conclusive. The "Ann Goss" referred to in the American exhibits might well have been known in Ireland as "Bridget Ann Goss" or "Bridget Goss" to the complete ignorance of the American declarant of said fact.

[2] These and all other conflicting circumstances to which appellant directs our attention were purely matters of initial reconciliation and determination by the trial court, and the fact that they did exist does not sufficiently militate against the force of the finding as to warrant out setting it aside on this appeal. We therefore hold that the finding in question finds sufficient support in the evidence.

[3] Appellant also contends that the trial court committed alleged errors of law in connection with its admission of certain evidence over her objections thereto. We have carefully examined these assignments of error, and, while it would appear that the action of the trial court in receiving certain depositions in evidence without affording appellant sufficient opportunity to object thereto in the manner hereinafter indicated was irregular, it is evident, for the reasons hereinafter stated, that such irregularity does not justify a reversal.

In support of their respective claims, all parties litigant relied in great part upon testimony of foreign or absent witnesses which was presented to the court in the form of depositions. Shortly after the trial was under way, the following proceedings transpired:

"Mr. Birnie: I will introduce the depositions and consider them read, your Honor, if it is pleasing to your Honor.

"Mr. Pritchard: We would rather have the depositions read, because we think there is so much objectionable matter in them that I would like to call the Court's attention to them.

"The Court: They are not going to be read in open court. I will read them.

"Mr. Pritchard: We want to make the objection that they are based on hearsay, and are incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial." (Italics ours.)

Mr. Birnie thereupon offered his depositions and the following took place:

"Mr. Pritchard: If your Honor please, for the purposes of the record, we wish to object to the depositions on the ground that they are hearsay." (Italics ours.)

At a later point in the record of the progress of the trial is the following passage:

"Mr. Pritchard: Now, if your Honor please, we would like to introduce * * * the depositions which were taken on behalf of our client. * * *

"The Court: I thought they were all in.

"Mr. Pritchard: We have not introduced them formally.

"The Court: Didn't you have any depositions at all?

"Mr. Pritchard: We have them but they were not introduced * * *"—whereupon appellant placed in evidence eight depositions in precisely the same manner as that in which those offered by respondents had been previously received over her objection.

[4] Doubtless there are occasions when the heavy demands upon the time of a busy trial court render it inexpedient and impracticable to permit on all occasions of the reading in extenso of depositions in open forum in all cases where the court is sitting without a jury. Nevertheless, in the absence of express or implied agreement thereto by counsel, the reception of depositions by the trial court in the manner above outlined constitutes a departure from the correct procedure and practice governing the reception in evidence of oral or written testimony, which requires and always implies that there shall be a full and fair opportunity afforded for the interposition of any and all grounds of legal objection to evidence of any character before its reception for the consideration of the trier of ultimate fact. An examination of our reports will disclose that, in the absence of some agreement to the pursuance of a contrary course, the unvaried practice has been to read depositions into the record as evidence, as indeed the only statute on the subject (§ 2022, Code Civ. Proc.) directly indicates is the proper course to pursue.

In pointing out the pernicious effects upon the minds of jurors likely to have been occasioned through the refusal of a trial court to make timely rulings upon objections to certain questions and answers appearing in depositions in advance of the reading of the same to a jury, our Supreme Court said: "No one familiar with the practice of our law need be informed of the vast amount of irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent matter which finds its way as evidence into such depositions. They are not taken before an officer who may rule out such objectionable matter, and there is no check therefore upon its admission. * * * Moreover * * * it will often happen in the taking of depositions, even upon settled interrogatories, as it occurs in court when a witness is testifying viva voce, that the answer to a pertinent question will itself be impertinent."

The quotation is from the Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, at page 665, 151 P. 138, 141, where, in summarizing the effect of the practice as thus condemned, the court further declared: "The result was that a mass of incompetent matter was thus read, heard, and considered by the jury."

Although it is obviously less probable that a trial judge will be unfairly influenced by the presence of illegal evidence before him to the same degree as would a jury under similar circumstances, all contention to that effect can be obviated by ruling at appropriate times upon the admissibility of the evidence.

However, before this court is authorized to review and act upon irregularities as such, it is a required condition precedent that the appellant shall have first proceeded as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, under subdivision 1 of section 657, and in the manner set forth in section 658 thereof. See in this connection Wagner v. Meinzer, 182 Cal. 608, 189 P. 435; Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 78 P. 540. Instead of so proceeding, as thus required, appellant has elected to bring to our attention the irregular act complained of merely as an asserted error of law, but in so doing he must of necessity fail in the establishment of his claim of reversible error for the reasons next herein set forth:

[5] From the previously quoted excerpts of the record it will be observed that appellant's objections were of a most general character, and were directed exclusively to the depositions, and that in no instance was objection taken to any given question or answer or to any specified portions of the depositions. The rule in general is that, "in order that an objection, even to the competency or relevancy of a deposition, should be effective, it should be specific, and addressed to those parts which are objectionable. A mere general objection to the deposition does not reach the defects, as it may be good in part and bad in part; and the objection should be limited to the part which is objectionable." Jones on Evidence (3d Ed.) § 676. To similar effect is the holding of our Supreme Court in Gassen v. Hendrick, 74 Cal. 444, 16 P. 242. Only the most fragmentary portions of the depositions against which appellant thus leveled his general objection would have been possibly subject to the urged ground of objection had the same been sufficiently specific; and, as was said of a somewhat similar situation: "If it be conceded that certain portions of it were hearsay and improper, the appellant did not specifically object to any particular parts of his evidence. Its motion to exclude was general, and, as the testimony was competent and some portions at least were relevant to the issue, appellants' objection cannot avail." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Taylor, 87 Ark. 331, 112 S. W. 745, 747.

It is therefore held that admission of these depositions in evidence over appellant's general objection did not constitute reversible error.

[6] Appellant makes the further claim that certain of respondents' exhibits in the nature of copies of baptismal and other records were so wanting in sufficient authentication as to warrant their exclusion from the evidence. But as part of his own case in chief he placed in evidence exhibits which were exactly similar in the method and degree of their authentication. Irrespective of the principle that evidence of a like kind (when not inherently illegal) is admissible to rebut that offered by the opposite party, the evidence in question cannot be regarded of such sufficient importance that its exclusion would have affected the finding of the court one way or the other, and the admission thereof in evidence, therefore, did not constitute reversible error.

For the reasons hereinbefore stated, the judgment and decree is affirmed.

ZUMWALT v. E. H. TRYON, Inc., et al.

Civ. 4687.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 4, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 3, 1932.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 1, 1932.

1. Automobiles ⇐216.

Sheep herder endeavoring to chase lamb from highway into field when struck by automobile held not "pedestrian" within statute requiring pedestrian to walk close to left-hand edge of highway (St. 1923, p. 517, § 150½, as added by St. 1929, p. 546, § 66).

This was so, since the duties of the sheep herder required him to be in the highway, and his status under the circumstances could not be determined by the rule under St. 1923, p. 517, § 150½, as added by St. 1929, p. 546, §§ 66, which governs the pedestrians.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Pedestrian," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Trial ⇐260(8).

Refusing defendant's comparative negligence instruction sufficiently covered by contributory negligence instruction held not error.

3. Damages ⇐132(3).

$12,500 damages to sheep herder for fracture of bone of leg below knee, injury to back resulting in spinal arthritis, and permanent injury to ankle and instep, held not excessive.

Circumstances disclosed that sheep herder was bedfast from injuries for 47 days, and that at end of that period, when able to be out of bed, had to use a crutch to get about, that he was 48 years of age at time of accident, earning $90 per month, and was then in good health, and there was substantial evidence that by reason of injuries the sheep herder would be unable to continue his occupation or engage in any other kind of hard labor during the remainder of his life.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1004(3).

Jury's award sustained by trial court will not be disturbed, unless so grossly disproportionate to compensation reasonably warranted as to create presumption of passion, prejudice, or corruption.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action by Ernest L. Zumwalt against E. H. Tryon, Inc., and James A. McNamee. Defendant McNamee having died prior to trial, the case proceeded against defendant E. H. Tryon, Inc., alone. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Fred C. Pugh, of Red Bluff, and W. M. Roll, for appellant.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for respondent.

JAMISON, Justice pro tem., delivered the opinion of the court.

This was an action for damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff, when struck by an automobile operated by defendant's employee, McNamee. The said McNamee having died prior to the trial, the case proceeded against defendant E. H. Tryon, Inc., alone. The case was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiff for $12,500; thereupon said defendant moved for a new trial; the same being denied, judgment was rendered for plaintiff and against said defendant for said sum. From this judgment said defendant appeals.

This accident occurred on the 21st of April, 1930, on the afternoon of a clear day, at a point on the Pacific Highway, and, according to the testimony of respondent's witnesses, about 150 feet south of a county road which enters said highway from the west known as the Bowman road. It appears that respondent and a boy named Davis were in charge of a band of sheep as herders, and had driven them through a gate and into a field some 50 feet south of where the said Bowman road enters said highway; that, in doing this, one of the lambs escaped from the band and remained on said highway.

These two herders, aided by their dog, were endeavoring to chase the lamb from said highway into the field at the time of the accident. While respondent was so engaged, McNamee, in company with another employee of appellant, was traveling south on said highway in an automobile operated by McNamee.

According to evidence of respondent and several witnesses of the accident, when the said automobile approached the said intersection it was traveling at a speed of from 45 to 50 miles per hour, and was on the left-hand or easterly side of said highway, and continued on that side until it struck respondent. Davis, who was near the said intersection, waved at the occupants to stop, but they paid no attention to him, and continued on down the highway at the same speed.

Respondent, following the said lamb, looked back and saw Davis wave at the said occupants, and he took off his hat and waved at them to stop. At this time respondent was on the left-hand side of said highway and about 4 or 5 feet from its easterly edge, the paved part of said highway being 20 feet wide. After waving at the occupants to stop, respondent continued on down the highway after the lamb, and, while passing down said highway on the left side thereof, and 4 or 5 feet from its easterly edge, he was struck in the back by the said automobile and knocked to the pavement and rendered unconscious.

There is ample testimony to substantiate these facts.

At the time of the accident W. J. Walton was in charge of some 3,000 sheep. They were being held on the said county road, at the point where it entered said highway. He was holding said sheep back from entering said highway until respondent turned said lamb into the field. He was seated on a mule, and had a clear and unobstructed view of the accident. W. P. Hayland just previous to the accident had driven his automobile up to the point where said county road entered the highway, and stopped there waiting for Walton to drive his sheep from said county road. He also saw the accident. Both of these witnesses and Davis testified to the facts hereinbefore set forth. Appellant produced one witness, George, the companion of McNamee in the automobile, whose testimony conflicted with that of respondent and his witnesses.

Appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions requested by it.

Instruction IX refused by the court is as follows:

"You are hereby instructed that section 150½ of the California Vehicle Act (added by St. 1929, p. 546, § 66) provides as follows:

" 'It shall be unlawful for any pedestrian to walk along and upon any highway outside of a business or residence district otherwise than close to his left-hand edge of the highway.'

"I further instruct you that if you should find that the plaintiff immediately prior to and at the time of the accident, was walking in a southerly direction upon the paved portion of the highway, it became and was his duty to comply with the provisions of the section of the California Vehicle Act, which I have just read, and to walk close to his left hand edge of said highway, provided you should also find that the place of the accident was outside of a business or residence district."

The court gave the first part of this instruction; that is to say, the portion containing the provisions of said section 150½, but refused the remainder.

We are not inclined to take the view that respondent was a pedestrian on said highway, at the time of the accident, within the meaning of said section 150½.

[1] Respondent was not a traveler upon the highway, but was there as a herder in the performance of his duties as such. Laborers, whose duties require that they work in the streets, are not considered in the same light as pedestrians. Ceola v. 44 Cigar Co., 253 Pa. 623, 98 A. 775. In the case of such persons the degree of care is different from that of a traveler, whose whole attention is directed to protecting his own safety. Huddy, Automobile Law, vols. 5–6, 180; Peters v. Schroeder, 290 Pa. 217, 138 A. 755; State Compensation Ins. Fund v. Scamell, 73 Cal. App. 285, 238 P. 780, 782.

In the case of King v. Green, 7 Cal. App. 473, 94 P. 777, 778, the court said: "Had a pedestrian with no occupation requiring his presence in that part of the street devoted to the use of vehicles, been struck by a passing vehicle while he was backing along the roadway without looking to see where he was going, it is clear that he would have been guilty of contributory negligence. * * * But the rights of a laborer whose duties require him to be in the roadway cannot be determined by the same rule."

In the case now before us the duties of respondent, as said herder, required him to be in the roadway, and his status, under these conditions, cannot be determined by the rule which governs the pedestrian.

In State, etc., Ins. Fund v. Scamell, supra, the court used the following language: "It here appears that plaintiff, at the time of the injury complained of, was where he had a legal right to be. He was attending to his work, and was under no legal compulsion to keep constantly looking behind to ascertain if he was likely to be run down. No warning or signal was given, or at least he heard none, nor did certain other witnesses, of the approach of the car. The testimony also shows that he was working near the curb adjacent to the space reserved for the parking of cars, and there was more than ample room for the driver to have passed him without danger of collision. These were facts for the trial court to consider in determining the question of negligence, and its finding cannot here be disturbed."

In the instant case no warning or signal was given, according to the testimony of respondent and his witnesses, and for quite a distance before the car struck respondent it was traveling on the left-hand side of the highway, and continued on the left-hand side until it struck respondent. No other cars were on the highway at the time of the accident, and there was nothing to prevent the driver of said automobile from having a clear view of respondent. There was ample room for the driver to have passed respondent, had he traveled on the right-hand side of the highway, as was his duty to do.

We are of the opinion that the court committed no error in refusing appellant's instruction XI, herein set forth; nor in refusing appellant's instruction No. X, which is to the same effect.

[2] Nor was error committed in refusing appellant's instruction No. VII, relating to comparative negligence.

The court fully and fairly instructed the jury upon the question of contributory negligence. This refused instruction was sufficiently covered by those given by the court.

[3] Appellant claims that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive. We are of the opinion that this claim is also without merit. Respondent was struck in the back, knocked down, and rendered unconscious. Immediately after receiving the injury, he was taken to the Sisters Hospital, where X-rays were taken, which disclosed a fracture of one of the bones of the leg below the knee. He was also found to be suffering from ruptures of the ligaments and muscles of the ankle and instep, and from injuries to his back. His leg from above the knee to a point below the instep was incased in a plaster cast. He remained at the hospital about four days, and, being without means to defray his expenses there, was removed to his home, where his wife acted as his nurse.

He was bedfast from said injuries for 47 days, and at the end of that period, when able to be out of bed, had to use a crutch to get about and continued to use the crutch until October 1, 1930.

During all of that time he suffered great pain from said injuries. Spinal arthritis developed from the injury to the back, causing extreme pain and loss of sleep. Injuries to his ankle and instep have rendered him unable to run or walk over rough ground, and these injuries are permanent. The injuries to his back will necessitate a specially fitted aluminum belt. There was testimony of physicians that this disease of spinal arthritis is of a permanent nature, and, while the pain caused by it may be lessened, it is incurable.

Respondent was 48 years of age at the time of the accident, was earning $90 per month, and was then in good health, and, according to the mortality tables, his expectancy of life was 23 years.

There was also substantial evidence that, by reason of said injuries, he will be unable to continue his occupation of herding sheep or engaging in any other kind of hard labor during the remainder of his life.

[4] The law is so well settled that the award of damages made by the jury and sustained by the trial court will not be disturbed, unless they are so grossly disproportionate to any compensation reasonably warranted by the facts as to shock the sense of justice and create the presumption that the verdict was the result of passion, prejudice, or corruption rather than an honest and sober judgment, that citations of authorities are unnecessary.

Lastly, appellant contends that the trial court erred in denying its motion for a new trial. This motion was submitted on affidavits produced by appellant and counter affidavits submitted by respondent.

We do not find that the trial court abused its discretion in denying said motion.

It is admitted that McNamee was an employee of appellant, and the evidence that he was engaged in the performance of his duties as such employee at the time of the accident is uncontradicted.

The judgment is affirmed.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Mrs. N. C. Benning, claimant, opposed by Mrs. Emma Behr, employer. To review an award rendered by the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of claimant, the employer brings certiorari.

Award affirmed.

Burt W. Busch, of Lakeport, and Arthur M. Dean, of Redding, for petitioner.

A. I. Townsend, of San Francisco, and W. H. Hazell, of Lakeport, for respondent.

Mr. Justice R. L. THOMPSON delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a petition to review an award of damages which was rendered on account of injuries which were sustained by the respondent Nancy C. Benning in the course of her employment in preparing fruit for a process of curing.

The petitioner owns a 95-acre fruit ranch in Lake county. In the month of June, 1930, she employed the claimant to assist her in cutting apricots for the purpose of drying them. She was paid for this service at the rate of 30 cents a box. There was no agreement to cut a specified amount of fruit. The cutting of fruit was performed in a shed which was situated on the petitioner's premises, 250 yards distant from her dwelling house. A well-defined pathway leads from the house to the shed.

There is a conflict of evidence, but the following statement of facts is adequately supported by the record: The claimant resided in Sonoma. She was temporarily visiting with her sister who lived on the property adjoining the petitioner's farm. These three ladies were engaged in cutting apricots at the petitioner's shed prior to the occurrence of the accident which is involved in this proceeding. The cutting of fruit was done under the direct supervision of the petitioner. In going to and returning from their work, the claimant and her sister were accustomed to pass the petitioner's dwelling house along the pathway mentioned. They carried with them their luncheons. With the consent or at the request of the petitioner, they ate their luncheons with her at the table in her home.

On the second day of their employment, these ladies went from the shed to the petitioner's home on the same premises for lunch. After completing the meal, the claimant told the petitioner they required at the shed some drinking water and a pail in which to wash their hands when they became smeared with fruit. The petitioner directed the claimant to take a canteen of water which hung from a nail on the porch, and a bucket which stood nearby and carry them to the shed. Both the canteen of water and the pail were intended for the general use of the employees at the shed. Mrs. Benning thereupon picked up the pail, and, taking the canteen of water, proceeded to carry them toward the shed. She had walked along the pathway but a short distance when she stepped upon an olive pit or some small rolling object and fell, breaking her ankle. She was seriously injured. A physician was called to set her ankle. He rendered medical aid.

In due time a claim for compensation was made. The Industrial Accident Commission found that the claimant was employed by the petitioner to prepare fruit for drying, and that she sustained a broken ankle from an accident which occurred in the course of her employment. An award of damages was rendered in her favor and against the petitioner. The cause was brought to this court by means of a petition for a writ of certiorari.

The petitioner contends that the award should be annulled for the reason that the claimant was engaged at the time of the accident in cutting fruit as an independent contractor and not as an employee; that she was not injured in the course of her employment, but upon the contrary that she sustained the broken ankle at the noontime when she was not engaged in her employment, and that the petitioner is relieved of responsibility by virtue of the application of the established rule of "going and coming" from work.

[1] Under the circumstances of this case, it appears that the claimant was an employee in the cutting of the fruit and not an independent contractor. She worked under the direct supervision of her employer and subject to her control. Hillen v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 199 Cal. 577, 250 P. 570, 571. In this cited case, wherein the employee was engaged in shingling a house in consideration of a specified sum for each thousand shingles laid, it is said: "A workman who is paid wages by the piece or quantity comes within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act the same as one who is paid by the day. Wages may be measured by time, by the piece, or by any other standard. McKinstry v. Guy Coal Co., 116 Kan. 192, 225 P. 743, and note in 38 A. L. R. 839. One of the best tests to determine whether the relation is that of an independent contractor or that of employer and employee is the right of control. It is not the fact of actual interference with the control, but the right to interfere, that makes the difference between an independent contractor and a servant or agent."

In the same case it is further said: "Whether or not the relation of employer and employee existed in this case, under the oral contract entered into, is a question of mixed law and fact, to be proved like any other question. The finding of the commission, in effect, that the relation [of employer and employee] existed between Hillen and Downing, is binding on this court. Pacific Gas & Elec. Co. v. Industrial Accident Com., 180 Cal. 497, 499, 181 P. 788."

In support of the finding of the commission to the effect that the employer in the present case had the absolute right to direct and control the manner of the performance of the work of the claimant in cutting the apricots, she testified: "Q. Did Mrs. Behr, all the time you were employed there have direction and supervision of the work that was going on? A. She certainly did, nobody else there." Regarding the same subject, Laura Taylor, the sister of the claimant, also testified: "Q. Mrs. Behr would direct you every day what was to be done, whether picking or cutting or both? A. Yes."

[2] We are also satisfied that the record amply supports the findings of the commission to the effect that the claimant was injured "in the course of and arising out of her employment." At the time of the accident she was returning to her place of employment along the pathway she and other employees were accustomed to walk on their way to the shed. She was engaged in carrying a canteen of water and a pail for the general use of the employees at the shed. She claims to have been carrying it at the request of the petitioner. There is no controversy regarding the fact that she was actually on the premises of the employer. The Supreme Court in the case of Makins v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 198 Cal. 698, 247 P. 202, 203, 49 A. L. R. 411, has said: "The rule is well settled that an employee, in going to work, comes under the protection of the act when he enters the employer's premises or upon the means provided for access thereto, though the premises and such means of access are not wholly under the employer's control or management." Globe Indemnity Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 208 Cal. 715, 284 P. 661, State Comp. Ins. Fund v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 89 Cal. App. 197, 264 P. 514; Cromwell v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 102 Cal. App. 499, 283 P. 375, 376.

In the case last cited, the late Mr. Justice Finch quoted with approval the following principle: " 'It is not necessary, in order to entitle the employee to compensation, that at the time of accident he have reached the place of employment and have actually begun there to render service. It is sufficient if he has come to the employer's premises and is seeking entrance thereto by a means of access provided by the employer or reasonably used by the employee.' "

It frequently becomes a question of fact to be determined from the circumstances of a particular case as to whether an employee is engaged in the labor for which he was hired, or whether his activities at the time of the accident are incident to such services so as to bring his conduct within the course of or arising out of the employment. Under the circumstances of the present case, we are persuaded that the claimant was injured in the course of and arising out of her employment.

The award is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Ethel Kallen and others against Ed Serretto and wife. From an order denying defendants' motion for a change of venue, they appeal.

Reversed.

Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for appellants.

Walter McGovern, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, P. J.

Plaintiffs sued in the city and county of San Francisco for damages arising out of an automobile collision which occurred in San Mateo county. The defendants Ed Serretto and wife moved for a change of venue to San Mateo county on the ground that they were both residents of that county. Their motion was denied and they have appealed on typewritten transcripts.

Two fictitious defendants were joined as "First Doe" and "Second Doe." As to them the complaint alleged that they had "some right, title, or interest in and to defendants' motor vehicle hereinafter mentioned." The collision was alleged to have been caused by the fact that "the defendants drove and operated a certain motor vehicle * * * in a careless, negligent, and unskillful manner." After the demurrer and demand for change of place of trial were filed by the two Serrettos, the plaintiffs were permitted to file an amended complaint in which it was alleged that "the defendants, acting through said defendant Ed Serretto, drove and operated their motor vehicle," etc. In the affidavit of plaintiffs' attorney filed in opposition to the motion for change of place of trial, it is averred that "First Doe" is one Irani, a resident of San Francisco. But it does not appear that he was named or substituted as a defendant, and no process was served upon him.

[1, 2] Upon this record appellants insist that they were entitled to a change of the place of trial for several reasons, of which it will be sufficient to consider but two: (1) The right of the moving party to a change depends upon the conditions existing at the time the demand is made. McClung v. Watt, 190 Cal. 155, 159, 211 P. 17, 19. Hence, the parties defendant "as revealed by the pleadings existing at the time" (McClung v. Watt) the demand was made and the demurrer was filed are the only parties to be considered on the motion for a change of the place of trial. (2) Fictitious defendants who have not been brought into court are not to be regarded in consideration of the motion for a change of venue. South v. County of San Benito, 40 Cal. App. 13, 19, 180 P. 354; Yuba County v. North America, etc., Co., 12 Cal. App. 223, 107 P. 139. When the appellants filed their demurrer and demand for a change of venue, they were the only real parties defendant named in the pleadings. In fact, the same condition existed at the time the motion was heard because no other defendant had been brought into court by substitution, appearance, or service of process. The amended complaint and the affidavit of plaintiffs' attorney, both of which were filed after appellants' appearance and demand, and from which it might be inferred that some other defendant might be brought in, could not be considered in the hearing of the motion to change. Appellants' residence in San Mateo county being conceded, they were entitled to a change of the place of trial to that county.

The order is reversed.

1. Witnesses ⇐297.

In prosecution of physician for attempting to procure miscarriage by witness, witness held privileged to refuse to answer questions regarding witness' visiting doctor's office, on ground that answers would tend to incriminate her (Code Civ. Proc. § 2065; Pen. Code, § 275; Const. art. 1, § 13).

In such prosecution under Pen. Code, § 274, witness was privileged under the provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 2065, and Const. art. 1, § 13, relating to witness' privilege to refuse to answer questions where answers would tend to incriminate witness, to refuse to answer questions as to who was with her when she visited the doctor's office, and what was the date of such visit, since any direct answer showing witness was present at the time and place of the alleged offense would have a tendency to subject witness to punishment under Pen. Code, § 275, providing in effect that any woman submitting to an illegal operation is guilty of a felony.

2. Witnesses ⇐308.

Witness may not arbitrarily refuse to answer question on ground that answer might incriminate him when court can determine no direct answer could incriminate him (Code Civ. Proc. § 2065; Const. art. 1, § 13).

Application by Alice Crow for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Santa Cruz County, to secure petitioner's release from confinement.

Petitioner discharged.

See, also, 14 P.(2d) 920.

Harry I. Stafford and Dean Cunha, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Simon M. Collins, Deputy Dist. Atty., of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Petitioner seeks her release on habeas corpus from confinement for an alleged contempt based upon her failure to answer certain questions as a witness in the trial of G. E. Grosse.

Said G. E. Grosse was charged by indictment under section 274 of the Penal Code with using instruments upon petitioner in the month of July, 1932, with the intent thereby to procure a miscarriage. Petitioner and her husband were called as witnesses upon the trial. The district attorney, after certain preliminary questions, asked petitioner: "Now coming down to the month of July, 1932, did you have occasion during that month to visit the office of Dr. Grosse?" She answered: "I refuse to testify on the ground that I may incriminate myself." A discussion followed between court and counsel in which the court recognized that the witness had a "constitutional right," but declared that there was nothing on the face of the question "which shows it would have any tendency to incriminate her." Counsel for defendant Grosse finally said, "We have no objection to the witness answering as to whether she went to Dr. Grosse's office," and the witness, after being directed to answer by the court, replied to the question in the affirmative. She was then asked, "Who was with you on that occasion?" to which she replied, "I still refuse to answer on the ground I might incriminate myself." The court was of the opinion that "the question at this stage would develop nothing that would tend to incriminate the witness" and instructed her to answer. The question was re-read and the witness again refused to answer it, restating the same ground for her refusal. She was further asked, "What was the date, to the best of your recollection, of your visit to Dr. Grosse's office?" She stated, "I still refuse to answer." The trial court found the witness guilty of contempt and ordered her into custody.

[1] Petitioner urges several grounds for her release, but we need consider only one of them. It is petitioner's contention that it was her right and privilege to decline to answer the above-mentioned questions under article 1, section 13, of the Constitution, and section 2065 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion this contention must be sustained. Said constitutional provision has been construed in Re Tahbel, 46 Cal. App. 755, 189 P. 804. Said section 2065, relating to witnesses, reads in part: "* * * But he need not give an answer which will have a tendency to subject him to punishment for a felony." Section 275 of the Penal Code provides in effect that any woman who submits to an illegal operation is guilty of a felony.

[2] The authorities on the general subject under discussion are quite exhaustively considered in Ex parte Berman, 105 Cal. App. 37, 287 P. 125. The object of such constitutional and statutory provisions as our own is stated on page 46 of 105 Cal. App., 287 P. 125, 129, as follows: "The object of the law is to afford to a party, called upon to give evidence in a proceeding inter alios, protection against being brought by means of his own evidence within the penalties of the law." It is clear, however, as indicated in the opinion, that a witness may not arbitrarily refuse to answer a question on the ground that his answer might incriminate him when the court can determine as a matter of law that "no direct answer which the witness may make can tend to criminate him." But here any direct answer showing that petitioner was present at the time and place that the offense was alleged to have been committed upon her by the defendant doctor would certainly "have a tendency" to subject her to punishment under section 275 of the Penal Code.

The questions propounded here were not as contended by the district attorney merely "preliminary questions," the answer to which could have no tendency to incriminate the petitioner. It is quite possible that the prosecution had sufficient evidence without the testimony of petitioner and her husband to establish all the necessary facts except the identity of the party upon whom the operation was performed, and that the identity could not be established without their testimony. It is further possible that the only questions which the prosecution desired to ask of the witnesses were those which would establish the fact that petitioner and her husband were the persons who came to the leged for the purpose of requesting that the office of the defendant doctor at the time al- operation be performed and having petitioner submit thereto at the hands of the defendant. Under such circumstances the answers to the questions propounded might be the only link required to complete the chain of evidence necessary to convict the defendant doctor under said section 274 as charged and also to convict the petitioner in a separate prosecution under said section 275.

The position taken by the district attorney is somewhat similar to that taken by the prosecuting attorney in the federal case (U. S. v. Burr, Fed. Cas. No. 14,692e) quoted on page 45 of the opinion in 105 Cal. App., 287 P. 125, 128 in Re Berman, supra, where it is said: " 'According to their statement a witness can never refuse to answer any question unless that answer, unconnected with other testimony, would be sufficient to convict him of a crime. This would be rendering the rule almost perfectly worthless. Many links frequently compose that chain of testimony which is necessary to convict any individual of a crime. It appears to the court to be the true sense of the rule that no witness is compellable to furnish any one of them against himself. It is certainly not only a possible but a probable case that a witness, by disclosing a single fact, may complete the testimony against himself, and to every effectual purpose accuse himself as entirely as he would by stating every circumstance which would be required for his conviction. That fact of itself might be unavailing, but all other facts without it would be insufficient. While that remains concealed within his own bosom he is safe; but draw it from thence, and he is exposed to a prosecution. The rule which declares that no man is compellable to accuse himself would most obviously be infringed by compelling a witness to disclose a fact of this description.' "

We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court erred when it determined as a matter of law that petitioner's answers to the questions propounded could have no tendency to incriminate her. They clearly might have such tendency, and it was petitioner's right and privilege to decline to answer any of the above-mentioned questions upon the ground stated. We fully realize the difficulty encountered in the prosecution of cases under section 274 of the Penal Code when those present and capable of establishing the facts are unwilling to testify because of fear of subjecting themselves to prosecution. But the constitutional and statutory guaranties accorded to petitioner cannot be swept aside merely because they may result in making difficult, or even impossible, the conviction of the accused.

In re Rogers, 129 Cal. 468, 62 P. 47, is cited in support of the action of the trial court, but we find nothing in the opinion in that case contrary to the views herein expressed. There the grand jury was considering a charge against a third person, and there was nothing in the question itself nor in the surrounding circumstances to indicate that it could have any tendency whatever to incriminate the witness. Under the facts, the court held that the witness was required to answer unless he made it appear that his answer "might at least have that tendency." Here the obvious purpose of the questions was to show that petitioner was present at the time and place when the offense was alleged to have been committed upon her person, and it was unnecessary for petitioner to make it appear that answers favorable to the prosecution would have a tendency to incriminate her as this was apparent under the circumstances.

The petitioner is discharged.

Cr. 1693.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 6, 1932.

Witnesses ⇐297.

In prosecution of physician for attempting to procure miscarriage by witness' wife, witness held privileged to refuse to answer questions regarding whether he visited doctor's office on certain date, on ground that answers might incriminate him.

Witness could properly refuse to answer questions whether on or about a specified date he had occasion to visit the doctor's office, and if on or about such date he went with some other person to the doctor's office, without further showing to make it appear that his answers would tend to incriminate him, since it was apparent that his answers might have a tendency to subject him to punishment as an accomplice.

Application by Jasper Crow for writ of habeas corpus against the Sheriff of Santa Cruz County to secure petitioner's release from confinement.

Petitioner discharged.

Harry I. Stafford and Dean Cunha, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Simon M. Collins, Deputy District Attorney, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

SPENCE, J.

Petitioner seeks his release on habeas corpus from confinement for an alleged contempt for failure to answer certain questions as a witness in the trial of one G. E. Grosse.

This is a companion case to Ex parte Alice Crow (Cal. App.) 14 P.(2d) 918, the opinion in which has been this day filed. Petitioner is the husband of said Alice Crow. After being sworn and asked the usual preliminary questions, he was asked: "Now I will ask you if on or about the 11th day of July, 1932, you had occasion to go to the office of Dr. Grosse?" He replied: "I refuse to testify on the ground that I might incriminate myself." The trial court directed petitioner to answer, saying: "There is nothing that appears by the question that could have any possible tendency to incriminate or degrade you." The witness still refused to answer. He was then asked: "Did you with any other person on or about the 11th day of July, 1932, go to the office of Dr. Grosse?" The petitioner again refused to answer upon the same ground. The trial court directed petitioner to answer this question, but he again refused. He was adjudged guilty of contempt and ordered into custody.

Considering the nature of the indictment, charging an offense by the defendant doctor committed on the person of the wife of petitioner, together with the nature of the questions propounded, we are of the opinion that petitioner could properly refuse to answer on the ground that his answers might incriminate him without any further showing to "make it appear" that his answers would have such tendency. This is true because it was apparent that his answers might have a tendency to subject him to punishment as an accomplice. The trial court could not say that they would not, and petitioner should not have been directed to reply. It may be pointed out that petitioner was not in the position of a witness having no connection with any person named in the indictment. He was the husband of the person upon whom the violation of section 274, Pen. Code, was alleged to have been committed, and the obvious purpose of the questions was to place him on the scene at the time.

For the reasons stated, together with those set forth in the opinion of Ex parte Alice Crow, supra, the petitioner is discharged.

Services rendered by attorney in attempt to restore incompetent to capacity held "necessaries" for which incompetent's estate is liable upon implied contract (Civ. Code, § 38).

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Necessaries," see Words and Phrases.]

CONREY, P. J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Collamer A. Bridge filed a claim against the estate of Charles A. Doyle, deceased, opposed by Alice E. S. Doyle, administratrix with the will annexed of the estate. The court appointed a referee, and the referee recommended that the claim be disallowed.

From an order denying the objections filed to the referee's report, claimant appeals.

YORK, J.

Charles A. Doyle, decedent herein, was adjudged incompetent by the superior court of Los Angeles county, and Alice E. S. Doyle, the respondent herein, was appointed guardian of his estate, and continued to act as the duly qualified guardian of decedent at all times thereafter until the date of his death. After the adjudication of incompetency, decedent conferred with appellant, an attorney at law, and requested him to institute the necessary proceedings to restore him (the said decedent) to competency. The incompetent died before these proceedings were instituted, and respondent was appointed administratrix of his estate. Appellant thereupon presented his claim for legal services rendered to decedent. An agreement for reference of the claim was entered into between these parties, and the court in due time made its order appointing a referee to try the controversy over the said creditor's claim of $50. The referee reported as her conclusion of law that appellant had no valid claim against decedent's estate, and recommended that the claim be disallowed. Appellant filed objections to the report of the referee, the matter was submitted to the court on briefs, and in due time the court made its order confirming the report of said referee, and denied the objections filed thereto. From such order this appeal is taken.

The referee apparently based her recommendation for disallowance of the claim upon section 40 of the Civil Code, the following recitation being incorporated in said report: "Sec. 40 of the Civil Code definitely defines the powers of persons whose incapacity has been adjudged, i. e., the incompetent has no right to contract."

Appellant contends that, despite section 40 of the Civil Code, legal services rendered to an incompetent are in the nature of necessaries, and that a contract to pay their reasonable value will be implied by law. In support of this theory, appellant cites several cases decided in foreign jurisdictions.

So far as the record in the instant case shows, no express contract was ever entered into by the appellant and decedent, and therefore sections 39 and 40 of the Civil Code, which refer to express contracts, are not applicable. Under the circumstances here presented, section 38 of the Civil Code, "A person entirely without understanding has no power to make a contract of any kind, but he is liable for the reasonable value of things furnished to him necessary for his support or the support of his family," may be invoked, in order to bind the estate of the incompetent upon a contract implied in law for the payment of necessaries, because we are inclined to the belief that services rendered by an attorney in an attempt to restore an incompetent to capacity should be classed as necessaries of life. Circumstances may well be imagined, where a guardian as well as members of the family of the incompetent turn a deaf ear to his urgent request that he be restored, and it would seem unjust to deny reasonable compensation to the attorney, who is instrumental in bringing such a situation to the attention of the court, in order that the status of the incompetent be determined.

The distinction between the two classes of cases—true contract and those implied in law—is aptly illustrated by two cases reported in volume 111, California Appellate Reports. The first of these, Nielsen v. Witter, 111 Cal. App. 742, 296 P. 121, was an action on a common count for money had and received, brought by an incompetent, through his guardian, to recover $1,500 paid by him to an attorney for legal services. Prior to commencement of the action, a notice of rescission was served upon the attorney by the guardian. It was held by the court that plaintiff had no mental capacity when he executed the contracts and that he was not bound by them. On the trial of the case, plaintiff by his guardian "offered to do equity, and include in his account such amount as would compensate defendant attorney for such services as might be deemed beneficial to defendant."

The second case, Estate of Nielsen, 111 Cal. App. 744, 296 P. 122, involves the same facts, and is an application for allowance of attorney's fees due for services rendered the incompetent. On the theory of contract implied in law, the court made an order fixing the sum of $1,250 as the reasonable value of the attorney's services rendered to the incompetent.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Action by A. F. Phelps, as trustee in bankruptcy, against Cecelia Davies. From judgment rendered, defendant appeals.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an action by a trustee in bankruptcy against the wife of the bankrupt, in which it is sought to quiet title to certain real property upon the theory that the property in question is the community property of the bankrupt and his wife. The wife defended upon the claim that the property in question is her separate property.

After finding that Stephen Davies and Cecelia Davies were married on November 23, 1912, and ever since have been and now are husband and wife, that they have lived upon the property in question continuously since November 7, 1919, and that Stephen Davies was adjudged a bankrupt on March 4, 1930, the court found:

"That the defendants Cecelia Davies and Stephen Davies, on or about the 7th day of November, 1919, purchased eighty-five (85) acres of land in the county of San Diego and state of California, a part of which land so purchased is described in plaintiff's complaint, and that the total purchase price was the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00), and that the defendant Cecelia Davies paid cash upon said purchase price in the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) which sum was her own separate property, having been the proceeds of property inherited by her from her grandfather's estate prior to her marriage with said Stephen Davies, and that she and her husband Stephen Davies executed a mortgage upon said real estate in the sum of eight thousand dollars ($8,000.00) as part of the purchase price thereof, and assumed the payment of a mortgage upon said premises of seven thousand dollars ($7,000) and that the title to said real estate so purchased by said Cecelia Davies was taken in the name of Stephen Davies, her husband, and during all times mentioned herein was managed and controlled by Stephen Davies.

"That subsequent thereto said Cecelia Davies and Stephen Davies sold forty-three (43) acres of said land for the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000.00) and used part of the proceeds of said sale for the purpose of paying off said mortgage given upon said real estate by herself and husband as part of the purchase price thereof, but that said Stephen Davies never invested any sum whatsoever in said real estate, and that the purchase price thereof, which was paid, was wholly paid out of the separate funds of said defendant Cecelia Davies."

The court then found that on January 3, 1929, Stephen Davies conveyed the property to Cecelia Davies; that on the same day Cecelia Davies filed a declaration of homestead upon the property; that on February 27, 1929, these two, with others, joined in a conveyance of the property to a title company for the purpose of correcting an error in the description thereof; that, when the property was so conveyed to the title company, the grantee was instructed to reconvey the same to Cecelia Davies; that subsequently the title company reconveyed the property to Stephen Davies without the knowledge or consent of Cecelia Davies; that on April 15, 1930, Stephen Davies executed and delivered to Cecelia Davies a quitclaim deed covering all his right, title, and interest in the property; and that the property is now incumbered by a mortgage for $7,900, "which sum represents a part of the purchase price of said real estate." As conclusions of law, the court found that Cecelia Davies is the owner of an undivided separate interest in said real property to the amount of $5,000, subject to existing mortgages, and that, subject to said separate interest and subject to the mortgage of record, the plaintiff is the owner of an interest in said property equal to the claims filed and allowed in the bankrupt estate, plus the ordinary cost of the proceeding, and that the plaintiff is entitled to have its title to that portion of the property quieted. A decree was entered in accordance with these conclusions, from which judgment the defendant has appealed.

In addition to the facts set forth in the findings, the uncontradicted evidence shows that, at the time of his marriage to appellant and at the time this property was purchased, Stephen Davies had neither money nor property; that shortly after their marriage the appellant received over $13,000 in cash from her grandfather's estate; that shortly thereafter she bought a place in Los Angeles, paying for it with $8,000 of her inheritance; that in 1919 she bought the property here in question for $20,000, paying $5,000 in cash which came from her inheritance, assuming a mortgage upon the property in the sum of $7,000, and executing a mortgage upon the real property, in which her husband joined, securing the balance of $8,000; that about two years later she sold the Los Angeles property and put all of the proceeds into the property here in question; that in allowing the property to stand in her husband's name, she had no intention of giving it to him; and that at all times she has claimed to be the owner of the property.

It is the contention of the appellant that the conclusions of law drawn by the court and the judgment entered are erroneous and that under the facts found judgment should have been entered in her favor. The respondent contends that the appellant acquired a separate interest in said property only to the extent of the $5,000 originally paid by her from her separate funds, and that all interest in the property above that specific sum became the community property of the parties. The only argument made by respondent is to the effect that, while money borrowed upon a wife's separate property and used as a part of the consideration for the purchase of other property is to be considered as her separate property, any mortgage assumed upon property being purchased, or placed therein by both husband and wife as a part of the purchase price, must be considered, as a matter of law, as money borrowed for the credit of the community, with a corresponding community interest in the property itself. In other words, it is contended that mortgages given or assumed as a part of the purchase price of property represent a proportionate community interest in the property so purchased, unless such mortgages are also secured by other property theretofore separately owned by one of the spouses.

[1, 2] In determining whether property is the separate property of one of the spouses, the source of the funds used in purchasing the property and the intention of the parties at the time are both important considerations. The mere fact that existing mortgages are assumed, or the fact that mortgages are given by husband and wife as a part of the purchase price is not, in itself, conclusive that the credit represented by these mortgages is the credit of the community. In Oldershaw v. Matteson & Williamson Mfg. Co., 19 Cal. App. 179, 125 P. 263, 265, the court said: "Neither the fact that the husband contributed all his time and skill in the conduct of the business, or that he joined his wife in the execution of notes given for money wherewith to make the purchase (assuming that he did), in the absence of any agreement to that effect, gave him any interest in the property."

In Heney v. Pesoli, 109 Cal. 53, 41 P. 819, 821, it was said: "Assuming, then, that the property was purchased by the plaintiff as and for her separate property, and that her husband paid no part of the purchase price, we do not find in the mere fact that her husband joined with her in the note and mortgage to secure a part of the purchase price, but paid nothing on account thereof, anything to rebut the deduction that it was and is the separate property of the plaintiff."

In that case the wife purchased the property, making a cash payment from her separate funds, assuming an existing mortgage, and agreeing to pay the balance of the purchase price about a year later. Her husband joined her in executing a mortgage upon this and other property owned by her. In its opinion the court further said:

"In the present case, the extrinsic evidence tended to show the intent to purchase the property by plaintiff as her separate estate, which intent was acquiesced in by her husband. That being so, the money borrowed and secured by a mortgage upon her separate property became also her separate property, and when it went to pay the residue of the purchase price of the land the whole estate vested in the plaintiff as her separate property.

"It is rational to conclude that money borrowed upon the security of the separate real estate of one of the spouses will, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, be treated as the separate property of the party owning such real estate."

In Murphy v. Clayton, 113 Cal. 153, 45 P. 267, 268, a case where land was purchased by husband and wife jointly, each paying one-half of the purchase price, and title being taken in the husband alone, the court said: "The consideration for the land having, at the time of the purchase, been paid (half of it by appellant's intestate, and half of it by the respondent), and the title taken by the former, a resulting trust arose in the land in favor of respondent for the undivided one-half thereof, that proportion being an aliquot part of the consideration."

In that case the court further said:

"The reasoning of the court in Breeze v. Brooks, 71 Cal. 169, 9 P. 670, and 11 P. 885, more nearly applies to this case than that of any other case I have found. The decree of the court below adjudged that a deed made by John Brooks to his brother and co-defendant, Patrick Brooks, was fraudulent and void; and that Patrick took the legal title thereunder in trust for John and his successors in interest; and that he holds the same in trust for the plaintiffs, who were creditors of John and purchasers at a sheriff's sale of the land conveyed, under a judgment in their favor against John. The court said: 'From the findings, it plainly appears that John had nothing except a naked legal title. Patrick had paid all the money for the land, and John, therefore, held it in trust for him. * * * John never, so far as Patrick knew, asserted any title adverse to Patrick's; and Patrick's right to assert his claim thereto was not barred, and John only conveyed to Patrick that which belonged to him.

" 'The findings negative the idea that the plaintiffs, in giving credit to John, relied on any statement of Patrick that John owned the land; nor is it there intimated that they examined the records of deeds * * * to find out what they disclosed in reference to John's title, or relied on them in any way to induce the credit which they extended to John. They seem to have relied on the facts that John lived on the land, claimed it in his conversations with them as his, and that he was insolvent, and Patrick knew it. * * *

" 'Therefore, it does not appear that the deed from John to Patrick was made to hinder, delay, or defraud creditors. It was simply made to reinvest Patrick with the legal title to his own land.' Held, that the purchaser at execution sale got no title, 'as a purchaser at such sale can get no title save that of the judgment debtor,' and that the findings, therefore, did not justify the decree. See the same case, upon a second appeal, reported in 97 Cal. 72, 31 P. 742 [22 L. R. A. 257].

"There is nothing illegal or against public policy in the mere fact that a party equitably entitled to real property permits the legal title to remain in another. Resulting trusts are fully recognized by our law, and every one is presumed to know the law."

[3, 4] In the case before us, not only did the husband pay no part of the consideration for the land, but he had nothing with which to have paid it, and no facts appear that would justify the inference or conclusion that his wife gave him or intended to give him any interest in the land, or that his credit was relied upon in any way in making the purchase. The entire capital which enabled the purchase to be made was furnished by the wife from her separate funds, and the facts that the deed was taken in his name, that he lived with her upon the property, and that he signed the mortgage covering a part of the purchase price, are not controlling. In Dyment v. Nelson, 166 Cal. 38, 134 P. 988, 989, in which a wife borrowed funds upon her own credit, although her husband signed the note, the court said: "Nor was the possession of the property by the husband and the registry of the yacht in his name sufficient to change its status. The fact that it was not community property being once established, the management of it by the husband raised no presumption except that he was holding it in trust for her."

While the court found that "the defendants Cecelia Davies and Stephen Davies" purchased the land here in controversy, it also found that "the title to said real estate so purchased by said Cecelia Davies was taken in the name of Stephen Davies." The other findings show exactly what was done, and there is no evidence that Stephen Davies had anything to do with the purchase of the land other than that the deed was taken in his name, that he lived with his wife upon the property, and that he managed the place. Under such circumstances, we think it must be held that he took and held the title in trust for his wife. The character of property, whether separate or community, is determined by the situation existing at the time it was purchased. The findings and the uncontradicted evidence show that this property was purchased by the wife with her separate funds, that a large amount of money from her separate estate was later put into the property, and that the only payment made upon the incumbrance came from a sale of a portion of the property itself. As was said in a somewhat similar case where, however, the property was taken in the name of both husband and wife, "The utmost that can here be claimed for Mr. Shaw in this regard is that he held the dry legal title to an undivided one-half of the property, as trustee for his wife, who was the sole beneficial owner thereof and entitled to have the same conveyed to her." Shaw v. Bernal, 163 Cal. 262, 124 P. 1012, 1015.

[5] We find nothing in the facts found or shown in the evidence that would have justified a judgment in favor of this husband had he brought an action against his wife for the purpose of establishing an interest in the property. The trustee of his bankrupt estate is in no better position, being vested by operation of law only with such title as the bankrupt had as of the date he was adjudged a bankrupt. National Bankruptcy Act § 70 (section 110, USCA, title 11).

Whether or not the last deed given by Stephen Davies to his wife was void, Davies at no time, so far as appears from the evidence, had any more than the dry legal title to the property. This he held as trustee for his wife, who was at all times entitled to a conveyance thereof.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

CAMPBELL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

Civ. 8714.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 6, 1932.

Prohibition ⇐13.

Contestee's petition for prohibition against court's proceeding with recount and contest presented moot issue, where recount determined contestee was rightly declared nominee.

Proceeding for writ of prohibition by William D. Campbell, prayed to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County to restrain respondent from proceeding with the recounting of certain ballots.

Alternative writ vacated and proceeding dismissed.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and S. V. O. Prichard, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem.

George W. Rochester, a candidate at the recent primary election for the Republican Party nomination for congressman, is seeking to have the Superior Court decree that he and not William D. Campbell, petitioner herein, has been nominated. The board of supervisors has canvassed the votes and declared Campbell nominated. Rochester bases his claim for a recount of the ballots upon an information and belief affidavit that there has been malconduct on the part of election officers in many definitely referred to precincts. Such malconduct, according to the affidavit, consisted of election officials dividing their forces and counting the ballots in several groups and not by a full quota of the election board, as well as the tallying and counting of Rochester votes in the Democratic column which should have gone in the Republican column. Rochester also sought the Democratic nomination.

In the midst of the counting the contestee petitioned this court to issue the writ of prohibition to prohibit the Superior Court from proceeding with the contest, on the ground that the allegations of fact in the affidavit were not of sufficient definiteness to justify the court in making a recount or to give it jurisdiction to make a recount of the ballots, and that if sufficient otherwise the affidavit could not be considered at all for the reason that it was based solely upon information and belief. This court issued its alternative writ prohibiting the Superior Court from making or entering any decision or judgment in such contest until further ordered. The Superior Court continued and concluded the counting, but has not announced a decision or caused any judgment to be entered.

Upon the argument here both parties agreed that there was no substantial issue, since the recount actually determined that Campbell, the contestee, had been rightly declared the nominee. It is contended, however, that the petition should not be dismissed, but that because of the great importance of the principle involved we should proceed to consider the matter and either issue or deny the peremptory writ. We have been sympathetic with this desire and have devoted considerable time to the problem presented. We have, however, arrived at the conclusion that the very reason urged for our continuing to take cognizance of the petition is a good reason why we should not do so. We think the points raised should have the fullest possible consideration, and the time at our disposal does not permit of this.

We think the question is moot, but whether or not it is now technically moot, it is so in fact. As was said in Foster v. Smith, 115 Cal. 611, 47 P. 591, 592: "Any opinion that we might give upon the merits of the plaintiffs' application to the superior court would not, therefore, be followed by any action on the part of that court, and would not have any binding authority, or constitute an adjudication of the rights of the parties. People v. Common Council of Troy, 82 N. Y. 575; Matter of Manning, 139 N. Y. 446, 34 N. E. 931. It was said in the case last cited, upon a similar question: 'The demands of actual, practical litigation are too pressing to permit the examination or discussion of academic questions such as this case in its present situation presents.'" See, also, Bradley v. Voorsanger, 143 Cal. 214, 76 P. 1031. In the instant case it may with propriety also be added that the make-up of the ballots must go to press very shortly, and we should not inject an inconvenience where no real issue impends. The Superior Court should be allowed to proceed to make its decision and to enter its judgment without delay.

We are cognizant of the fact that if petitioner is right in his position a recount of ballots would be very difficult to secure. On the other hand, if loose and indefinite allegations, supported only by information and belief affidavits, are all that is needed to start a recount, very undesirable results may follow. We think the subject fertile field for legislative consideration.

The alternative writ is vacated and the proceeding dismissed.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1932. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Eminent domain ⇐265(5).

Where plaintiff dismissed condemnation proceedings after trial, fees of landowners' expert witnesses not appointed by court held not taxable against plaintiff as "costs" (Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, 1871).

Fees of expert witnesses who had been called by landowners to testify as to the value of the land, but who had not been appointed by court, were not taxable as "costs" against the plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. § 1255a, since section 1871, empowering trial court in any proceeding, civil or criminal, to appoint and fix the compensation of expert witnesses, applied and was intended to provide means for a fair and complete ascertainment of facts involved, and entirely safeguards a defendant in condemnation proceeding from loss in case of abandonment by the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Costs," see Words and Phrases.]

2. Eminent domain ⇐265(5).

That attorneys' fees allowed against plaintiff dismissing condemnation proceedings after trial exceeded amount at which defendants' property was appraised held not to show trial court abused discretion in allowing such fees.

CRAIG, Acting P. J.

Three cases were consolidated upon appeal by the City of Los Angeles from orders denying motions to tax costs in eminent domain proceedings, following the dismissal thereof after trial.

[1] The principal question presented necessitates an interpretation of section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to witness' fees. It is therein provided: "Upon such abandonment, express or implied, on motion of defendant, a judgment shall be entered dismissing the proceeding and awarding the defendant his costs and disbursements, which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees." The appellant excepted to the allowance of fees to expert witnesses who had appraised the designated properties and who were called by the respondents to testify as to values. It is contended that these are not proper taxable items, for the reason that said witnesses were not appointed by the court, but were employed by the defendants.

It has been determined that the fees of expert witnesses in condemnation proceedings are not authorized under sections 1022, 1025, and 1255 of the Code of Civil Procedure which relate to "costs." City of Los Angeles v. Vickers, 81 Cal. App. 737, 254 P. 687. As there said, adopting the language of another court: "'The word "costs," when used in relation to the expenses of legal proceedings, means the sum prescribed by law as charges for the services enumerated in the fee-bill.'" It contemplates only such costs as are authorized by statute. Said section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that, upon abandonment of proceedings in eminent domain before the expiration of thirty days after final judgment, the defendant may have his necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial. Section 1871, embraced in title 1, part 4, of the same Code, wherein the Legislature established "general principles of evidence" empowers the trial court in any proceeding, civil or criminal, to appoint and fix the compensation of expert witnesses whenever it shall be made to appear that their evidence is or will be required by the court or any party to the action. Said section further plainly states, however, that: "Nothing contained in this section shall be deemed or construed so as to prevent any party to any action or proceeding from producing other expert evidence as to such matter or matters, but where other expert witnesses are called by a party to an action or proceeding they shall be entitled to the ordinary witness fees only and such witness fees shall be taxed and allowed in like manner as other witness fees." The respondents seek to bring the case within the rule heretofore announced that such a proceeding as the instant one "is so differentiated from the ordinary actions or proceedings in a court of justice * * * as to bring it within the settled test justifying the assignment of the proceeding to a particular class for the purposes of reasonable provisions not applicable to other classes of actions." City of Los Angeles v. Cline, 40 Cal. App. 487, 181 P. 78, 79.

The decisions so cited relate only to attorneys' fees, which are expressly made allowable in proper cases by section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are cited to no authority which can be said to justify the conclusion that section 1871 is not applicable here, or that a party has the power which is elsewhere vested in the court to determine what expert evidence may be required, and thus to include the cost thereof as a necessary expense in preparing for trial. We have no doubt that this section does apply to condemnation proceedings, and that it was intended by the Legislature to provide means for a fair and complete ascertainment of facts involved, in this as well as any other proceeding wherein its provisions are used. We conclude that the charge made for expert witnesses other than as ordinary witnesses should be disallowed the more readily because as to such expenses section 1871 entirely safeguards a defendant in condemnation proceedings from loss in case of abandonment by the plaintiff. Under its provisions it is only necessary that a party who desires to use experts should satisfy the court of this necessity and secure an order appointing one or more such witnesses and allowing reasonable and proper compensation for their services. It cannot be assumed, contrary to the admissions of all parties to the present appeals, that the witnesses in question were not such as were entitled "to the ordinary witness fees only." It is conceded by the respondents that their experts were called by them, and, their category having been defined by legislative enactment, it does not permit of another characterization by judicial interpretation.

[2] It is contended that an item of attorneys' fees, being more than the amount at which the defendant's property was appraised, was excessive, and that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the same. It is not contended, however, that such fees were unreasonable for whatever services the trial court found to have been rendered, nor is any authority cited tending to make the ground assigned a basis for denying or reducing the compensation adjudged as reasonable.

It is ordered that the judgment for witnesses' fees be modified as indicated herein, and, as so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

STEPHENS, Justice pro tem.

I dissent.

I do not think the citation of cases on the general question of costs is helpful in this case. Section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure is unmistakably a statute applying alone to cases in which the extraordinary power of eminent domain is sought to be exercised. It recognizes the limited meaning of "costs and disbursements," and specifically adds to the ordinary cost bill disbursements "which shall include all necessary expenses incurred in preparing for trial and reasonable attorney fees." The Legislature evidently did not consider that the usual allowance of "costs and disbursements" to the winning party properly covered the situation described in 1255a, supra, so it proceeded to provide specifically therefor. There is sound reason for this legislation. Too often ambitious municipalities have pushed condemnation proceedings to judgment only to abandon them before paying out the money when the values exceeded the engineering estimates. That the ordinary cost bill fell far short of making the property owner whole is obvious.

I think the evident purpose of section 1255a of the Code of Civil Procedure is disregarded in the main opinion, for it holds that section 1871 of the Code of Civil Procedure in a large measure supersedes section 1255a. If this is a proper interpretation, it cuts the very heart out of the latter section. It is my opinion that the purposes of these two Code sections are entirely different.

Section 1871 is a permissive statute. Either one or all parties may or may not act under it. If a party acts under it, the court selects and appoints the experts, and the fee is taxed as costs. If a party does not act under it, he selects his own experts, and pays them except for the small witness fee. A party has a perfect right to take either course according to his own judgment, and it is entirely beyond my comprehension how this choice can or does affect the "necessary expenses in preparing for trial." Respondents here chose to select their own experts. Under 1255a, if the experts were "necessary," their reasonable fee must be repaid by the plaintiff if it abandons its case. Bear in mind that section 1871 is a general statute applying to all cases within its scope except cases specially covered by other statutes. Section 1255a is a special statute enacted to right occurring wrongs in condemnation proceedings. Sections 84, 85, and 86, California Jurisprudence, volume 23, treating, respectively, "Presumption against Repeal by Implication," "Identity of Subject and Object," and "Inconsistency and Repugnancy," may be read in this connection with profit.

Expert testimony is constantly being criticized by the courts, but, where technical knowledge is required, it seems there is no better way to get it than from men learned in the particular line of information needed. Despite the abuses, I know of no better way to arrive at the truth than through the sworn testimony of men who have prepared the details of a case in which they are called to testify and to submit themselves to cross-examination. That a man's property should be taken from him for a compensation estimated by a witness chosen for him and with whom he has no right to confer, and by a witness whose extent of examination of the property and the elements that affect its value he has no right to know until the witness reaches the witness stand, is monstrous. It is entirely foreign to our system of jurisprudence. And yet this is the logic of every scheme for judicial selection of experts. No party should ever be required to have his case affected by judge-chosen witnesses. Section 1871 according to the main opinion, effectually says to every property owner, in an eminent domain case, "Let the judge appoint your experts or you cannot have their fees repaid you in case the plaintiff abandons the case." I cannot agree with this conclusion, and I have a suspicion of its constitutionality if this conclusion is a correct one. The trial judge should have decided whether or not the expert witnesses employed by respondents were necessary, and, if they or any of them were necessary, he should have fixed a reasonable compensation for them and included the same in the costs allowed.

The petition for hearing in the Supreme Court is denied.

Our denial of the petition for transfer in this cause is based upon the ground that enough appears on the face of the proceedings to show that Austin is primarily liable for the loss suffered by respondents and that the Torrens Title fund (St. 1915, p. 1932) may not be resorted to until an execution against Austin shall have been returned unsatisfied. It was the duty of the court to require the presence of Austin. St. 1915, pp. 1932, 1949, § 105; Code Civ. Proc. § 389; O'Connor v. Irvine, 74 Cal. 442, 16 P. 236; Mitau v. WITHERS v. KERR, Registrar of Voters.
S. F. 14790.

Supreme Court of California.

Elections ⊂⊃143.

Independent candidate for office of congressional Representative held properly nominated by nomination papers signed by over 5 per cent. of electors who voted at preceding general election in territory comprised in congressional district created after such election (Pol. Code, § 1188, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2281; Pol. Code, § 117, subd. 18, as amended by St. 1931, p. 297).

Such candidate was properly nominated for purpose of placing his name on next general election ballot as independent candidate, in view of Pol. Code, § 1188, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2281, which provides that signatures attached to independent nomination papers thereunder must be at least 5 per cent. in number of entire vote cast at last preceding general election "in the state, district, or political subdivision for which the nomination is to be made," since term "district" may be considered as equivalent of "area" or "territory," and, if statute is thus construed, literal compliance therewith was accomplished, and even without such construction proceedings to nominate such candidate were in substantial compliance with statute.

PER CURIAM.

Mandate to compel the respondent, as registrar of voters of Los Angeles county, to omit from the ballot to be used at the ensuing general election the name of William E. Hinshaw as a candidate for Representative in Congress for the Eighteenth congressional district in California.

William E. Hinshaw was not a candidate for any office at the primary election of August 30, 1932. On September 29, 1932, he filed in the office of the respondent registrar nomination papers for the purpose of placing his name upon the general election ballot as an independent candidate for said office in the manner and form provided by section 1188 of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2281. These papers, upon examination by the registrar, were found to contain signatures of electors qualified to sign the same in excess of 5 per cent. of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general election in the territory comprising the Eighteenth congressional district. The registrar so certified to the secretary of state, and in turn received from the secretary of state a list of names, including the name of William E. Hinshaw for said office, to be placed on the general election ballot in said district.

The Eighteenth congressional district was established by the Legislature at its session in 1931, and comprises the sixty-ninth, seventieth, and seventy-first assembly districts. St. 1931, p. 297, section 117, Pol. Code, subd. 18. This district was carved out of a portion of the old ninth congressional district without any change in precinct lines. It was therefore a comparatively easy matter for the registrar to check the nomination papers and determine whether the signatures attached thereto were of qualified electors sufficient in number in the territory or area comprising the present Eighteenth congressional district.

Section 1188 of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2281 provides that the signatures to be attached to independent nomination papers thereunder must be at least 5 per cent. in number of the entire vote cast at the last preceding general election "in the state, district or political subdivision for which the nomination is to be made." It is the petitioner's position that, since the old ninth congressional district was wiped out by the 1931 reapportionment measure, no independent nominations for said office may be made in the new district because the latter was not in existence at the last general election. In order to uphold this contention, it would be necessary to conclude that it was the intention of the Legislature to abolish the right to independent nominations in new congressional districts, at the same time continuing the right in the district or districts whose boundaries had not been changed. This conclusion would not be justified, unless compelled by some expression of legislative will to that effect, and we find none. For the purposes of this proceeding, it is enough to say that the term "district" may be considered as the equivalent of "area" or "territory." Without such construction, it is fair to say that the proceedings to nominate Mr. Hinshaw were in substantial compliance with the statute. And with that construction a literal compliance would seem to have been accomplished.

The peremptory writ is denied.

Criminal law ⚖371(3), 1169(12).

In prosecution for issuing check without sufficient funds, defense being that check was mistakenly drawn on wrong bank, admitting evidence that, subsequently, defendant drew checks on his bank, but that three days thereafter account was closed, held prejudicial error (Pen. Code, § 476a).

It was error to admit such evidence since, at time of utterance of such subsequent checks, there was sufficient money in bank to cover them, and their issuance did, therefore, not constitute violation of Pen. Code, § 476a; and court could not say that admission of such evidence was not prejudicial, since defendant's story as to excusable mistake in issuing check directly involved in prosecution seemed probable, and corroborating circumstances appeared to lend substantial support thereto.

HOUSER, J.

Under the provisions of section 476a of the Penal Code, defendant was charged with the commission of the criminal offense of "issuing check without sufficient funds." From a judgment of conviction and from an order by which his motion for a new trial was denied, defendant has appealed to this court.

On the trial of the action defendant admitted the issuance by him of the check in question; also the fact that in the bank on which the check was drawn he had no funds. In substance, his defense consisted in the claim that the check was issued by reason of an excusable mistake on his part; and in that regard the story told by defendant seemed probable, and the corroborating circumstances appeared to lend substantial support thereto. In effect, it was that, although defendant had no banking account with the bank on which the check in question was drawn, he did have an account in another bank; and that in issuing the check on which he was prosecuted, the reason why he had used a check on a bank in which he had no funds was that his employment required him to carry blank checks on many different banks for the use and convenience of persons with whom he transacted business, and that on the occasion in question, in his haste and confusion, he inadvertently used a check on a bank in which he had no account, instead of a check on the bank in which he had funds deposited sufficient in amount to satisfy and pay the check for the issuance of which he was on trial.

The principal complaint registered by appellant is that, regarding so-called "similar offenses" said to have been committed by defendant, evidence was erroneously admitted against him. The facts with relation thereto appear to be that approximately sixteen days after the date of the issuance of the check in question, defendant issued two other checks on the bank in which he kept his account; that at the time of such issuance defendant had funds in said bank sufficient to pay each of said checks; but that three days after the latter of such checks was issued, the account of defendant in his bank was "closed"; and that thereafter, when the said two checks were presented by the holder thereof to the bank for payment, the bank refused to pay the same.

An examination of the pertinent provisions of section 476a of the Penal Code, for the alleged violation of which defendant was prosecuted, discloses the situation that, in effect, it denounces the utterance of "any check * * * upon any bank * * * for the payment of money, knowing at the time of such * * * uttering * * * that the maker * * * has not sufficient funds in, or credit with said bank * * * for the payment of such check * * * in full upon its presentation."

From a consideration of the facts which related to the utterance of the two checks to which attention hereinbefore has been directed, it is clear that as to the issuance of neither of such checks did defendant place himself within the situation defined by the statute. Regarding the status of the banking account of defendant "at the time of utterance," in substance the evidence was that "on the day that these checks were written, there was sufficient money in the bank to cover them"; from which it follows that had the checks been seasonably presented for payment, as far as defendant was concerned, each of them would have been paid "in full upon its presentation." It results that in the utterance of the two checks in question, at least no "similar offense" was committed by defendant.

With reference to the general rule in cases of the character of that here under consideration, in 8 Ruling Case Law 202, the rule is thus stated: "* * * Where a felonious intent is an essential ingredient of the crime charged, and the act is claimed to have been innocently or accidentally done, or by mistake, when the result is claimed to have followed the act lawfully done for a legitimate purpose, or where there is room for such an inference, it is proper to characterize the act by proof of other like acts producing the same result, as tending to show guilty knowledge, and the intent and purpose with which the particular act was done, and to rebut the presumption that might otherwise obtain. But the evidence of the other acts relied upon must show them to be identical with the act in question, otherwise they have no probative value so far as this question of mistake or accident is concerned." Citing State v. Hyde, 234 Mo. 200, 136 S. W. 316, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 191.

In view of the circumstances which surrounded defendant at the time when he drew the check for the utterance of which he was placed on trial, it cannot be said that he was not prejudicially affected by the admission of the evidence which related to the two checks which were assumed to constitute "similar offenses." No other error specified by appellant requires consideration by this court.

The judgment and the order by which defendant's motion for a new trial was denied are reversed.

JENNINGS, J.

This is an appeal from an order of the superior court setting aside and vacating a default judgment obtained after publication of summons.

The proceedings herein were instituted by petitioners Walter Leo Whitesell and Carol Georgia Whitesell under the provisions of the Land Title Law adopted by the initiative method at the general election of November 3, 1914 (St. 1915, p. 1932). The petition was filed on December 20, 1928. In it petitioners alleged that they were owners in fee simple, as joint tenants of certain described land, and that William C. La Berge, whose address was unknown to them, claimed some right, title, or interest in the premises adversely to petitioners which said claim was alleged to be without right. The prayer of the petition was for a decree quieting the title of petitioners to the property. Thereupon, the court ordered that notice of the filing of the petition be given as provided in the act and that it be published for the required time. In compliance with the court's order, notice of the filing of the petition was published and a copy of the notice was mailed to said William C. La Berge, in an envelope addressed to him, in care of the county clerk of Los Angeles county for the reason that his address could not, with reasonable diligence, be ascertained. Due proof of the publication and mailing of said notice was made, and the court thereafter, on April 25, 1929, rendered its decree adjudging that said William C. La Berge had no right, title, or interest to the land described in the petition and quieting the title of petitioners to the said land. At some time prior to April 11, 1930, Ora E. La Berge gave notice that on said April 11, 1930, she would move the court to vacate and set aside the said decree. The motion was made on the ground that summons in the proceeding was not personally served on defendant William C. La Berge and was supported by an affidavit of Ora E. La Berge. This affidavit set forth that affiant and her former husband, William C. La Berge, purchased the property and acquired title thereto by deed dated July 18, 1922; that on June 1, 1925, affiant conveyed her interest in the property to William C. La Berge; that on May 11, 1928, William C. La Berge conveyed to affiant all his right, title, and interest in said property; that neither affiant nor William C. La Berge were personally served with summons in the proceeding; and that neither had notice of the filing of the petition until January 20, 1930. Accompanying the affidavit a proposed answer was filed by said Ora E. La Berge alleging the conveyance made to her by William C. La Berge on May 11, 1928, and setting up her right to contest the petition. In opposition to the motion thus made petitioners filed affidavits in which it is set out that, at the time the petition was filed and when the decree was entered, the deed of May 11, 1928, had not been recorded and was not recorded until December 17, 1929; that after the decree quieting their title to the property had been rendered, petitioners sold said property for a valuable consideration and a new certificate was issued to the purchasers; that petitioners had no knowledge or information of the asserted claim of Ora La Berge until after they had disposed of the property; that the sale made by them was a bona fide sale for valuable consideration paid by the purchasers at the time of said sale. On April 22, 1930, the court made its order setting aside the decree rendered on April 25, 1929, and granting leave to Ora E. La Berge to answer to the merits of the action.

[1] In support of their appeal from the order vacating the decree and granting permission to respondent to file her answer, appellants first contend that the court was without jurisdiction to make such an order. As upholding the contention thus advanced, appellants have cited and rely upon the decisions in Cooper v. Buxton, 186 Cal. 330, 199 P. 6, and Sharp v. Eagle Lake Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 386, 212 P. 933. In the first of these decisions it was held that an action to set aside a decree of registration of title under the Land Title Law, on the ground of mistake, must be brought within one year after such registration. In the second case it was held that a direct attack upon a void judgment may be made by any one interested by a motion to set it aside in the court which rendered it. It was specifically noted that the motion to set aside the judgment was not made pursuant to the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. It is immediately apparent that neither of the above-cited cases is applicable to the situation here presented for the reason that respondent did not seek to set aside the judgment by an independent action based upon mistake, but that she made a motion in the very court which rendered the judgment to be relieved from it and to be permitted to answer to the merits of the cause pursuant to the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Nor was her motion based upon the ground that the decree from which she sought to be relieved was taken against her through her mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. It was made upon the sole ground that summons in the action had not been personally served upon the defendant William C. La Berge, her predecessor in interest. That portion of the statute (section 473, Code Civ. Proc.) under which respondent's application for relief was presented is in the following language: "When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action." It is conceded that notice of the filing of the petition was not personally served on the defendant William C. La Berge nor on respondent and that the court's order permitting respondent to answer to the merits of the proceeding was made within one year after the rendition of the decree which adjudged that William C. La Berge had no interest in the property involved and quieted the title of appellants to such property. If, therefore, section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, is available to a defendant in a proceeding of the character here instituted, the contention of appellants that the court lacked jurisdiction to grant the relief sought is fully answered. In Beggs v. Riordan, 44 Cal. App. 230, 186 P. 187, 188, a defendant in a proceeding brought under the provisions of the Land Title Law moved the court to set aside the judgment rendered against her and to permit her to defend. The motion was denied and defendant appealed. The court's order refusing the relief sought was reversed, the appellate court holding that the affidavits of merits presented by the defendant were sufficient and that the court erred in denying the motion. The following language from the decision is pertinent to the problem here under consideration: "Under the circumstances shown by the record there is no doubt that appellant's motion, which was made within one year after the rendition of the judgment, should have been granted, if the affidavits of merits upon which the motion was made were sufficient. Code Civ. Proc. § 473." In Shupe v. Evans, 86 Cal. App. 700, 261 P. 492, 493, an appeal was taken from an order of the superior court, vacating a default judgment in an unlawful detainer action. It was contended by appellant that section 473 had no application to cases in unlawful detainer. This contention was not upheld. The court pointed out that the statute has a very wide application, citing that it had been held applicable to various special proceedings, among others. "Torrens title proceedings (Beggs v. Riordan, 44 Cal. App. 230, 186 P. 187)." The above-cited decisions are in conformity with the well-settled rule that the statute under consideration is a remedial provision and should be so applied as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits. 14 Cal. Jur. p. 1012; Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 666, 63 P. 63; Mitchell v. Calif., etc., S. S. Co., 156 Cal. 576, 105 P. 590; Waybright v. Anderson, 200 Cal. 374, 377, 253 P. 148; Weck v. Sucher, 96 Cal. App. 422, 425, 274 P. 579.

[2, 3] In conformity with the policy thus established of viewing the statute as a remedial provision to be liberally construed and in accordance with the decision in Beggs v. Riordan, supra, we entertain no difficulty in holding that the court had jurisdiction to make the order vacating the judgment. In connection with the contention that the court lacked jurisdiction to make the order some question is raised as to the sufficiency of respondent's affidavit of merits. Since that clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, under which the motion to vacate the judgment herein was made, provides for the granting of relief for the purpose of permitting a defendant to answer "to the merits of the original action," the condition is implied that it must be made to appear that the defendant has a good defense on the merits. 14 Cal. Jur. p. 1031; Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 P. 691, 12 Ann. Cas. 990; Boland v. All Persons, etc., 160 Cal. 486, 490, 117 P. 547, 548; Osmont v. All Persons, etc., 165 Cal. 587, 590, 133 P. 480. An examination of the affidavit of respondent filed in support of the motion discloses that the objections raised by appellants are entirely unfounded and that the instrument contains a full and satisfactory statement of the existence of a defense on the merits.

[4] The second contention advanced by appellants is that the court erred in holding that respondent is entitled to the relief sought under the above-quoted clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. In this connection, it is pointed out that she is not a defendant in the proceeding and it is confidently asserted that she is not the legal representative of a defendant. It must be conceded that she was not made a defendant in the proceeding since the only defendant named in the petition is William C. La Berge. It must also be conceded that it is at least doubtful whether she may properly be considered to be the legal representative of William C. La Berge since her affidavit filed in support of her motion for relief shows that she claims title in herself by virtue of a deed executed in her favor more than seven months prior to the filing of the petition for registration by appellants. Her claim therefore has no reference to the proceeding herein instituted by appellants nor to the fact that her grantor is the defendant in such proceeding. However, in order that we may arrive at a proper determination of whether the court erred in granting her application for relief, some consideration of the result sought to be achieved by the proceeding here instituted is required. The court found that all persons interested in the action have either filed their assent to the registration or have been duly and properly served with notice of the filing of the petition and that the time for appearance has expired and all such persons "known and unknown" are properly before the court; that appellants are owners of an estate in fee simple in the property; that two named defendants, Belmont Pier Tract Company, a corporation, and William C. La Berge, have no claim, right, title, or interest in the land and are forever debarred from asserting any claim thereto; that applicants (appellants) are the owners of the premises; that no other person, firm, or corporation has any right, title, or interest in said land or any part thereof. The decree rendered by the court adjudges that the title of appellants be confirmed and registered and that it shall forever quiet the title to the land "and be final and conclusive against the rights of all persons, known and unknown, to assert any claims, interest, estate, lien, or demand of any kind or nature whatsoever, against said land, or any part thereof." It is apparent that the effect of the decree thus rendered is to foreclose finally the claim of any person, other than appellants, to the land whose title is adjudged to be in appellants. It is in conformity with the very purpose of the statute under whose provisions the proceeding was instituted, which is not only to create and perpetuate a marketable title to land sought to be registered but also to determine conclusively every and all adverse claims against the registered land. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. v. Griset, 189 Cal. 382, 388, 208 P. 673. The act (St. 1915, pp. 1932, 1936, § 16) provides that "a decree of the court ordering registration shall be in the nature of a decree in rem, shall forever quiet the title to the land therein ordered registered and shall be final and conclusive as against the rights of all persons, known and unknown, to assert any estate, interest, claim, lien or demand of any kind or nature whatsoever, against the land so ordered registered." Respondent herein is a person unknown to appellants, unnamed by them in their petition for registration, who asserts a claim in the land and whose claim is effectually and for all time destroyed by the comprehensive decree rendered by the court. It is not open to doubt that, had she been advised of the pendency of the proceeding, she might have entered an appearance and asserted her claim to the land. In this event, she would have appeared as a defendant in the proceeding presenting her claim in opposition to that of appellants. Her application for relief from the decree which so conclusively disposes of whatever interest she has in the land amounts to an application of an unnamed and unknown defendant. Had her claim in the property been known and had she been named as a defendant in the proceeding and served by publication she would have been entitled to apply for relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. Beggs v. Riordan, supra. Although she was not named as a defendant, it is obvious that her interest in the land is as certainly extinguished by the decree as though she had been named in the petition. It is therefore impossible to escape the conclusion that she was entitled to make her application for relief not as the legal representative of her husband, but in her own right as an adversary of appellants, asserting a claim in opposition to the granting of the petition.

[5] The final contention presented by appellants is that the court erred in vacating the judgment and in permitting respondent to answer to the merits for the reason that such action affected the rights of purchasers of the property who acquired title subsequent to the rendition of the decree, in good faith, for valuable consideration, and without notice of any claim of respondent in such property. The record herein shows that the fact of the transfer of the property by appellants subsequent to the rendition of the decree to bona fide purchasers for a valuable consideration was alleged in the affidavit of appellant Walter Leo Whitesell filed in opposition to respondent's motion to set aside the default judgment. An affidavit of appellants' counsel also filed in opposition to respondent's motion alleges that the deed from defendant William C. La Berge to respondent dated May 11, 1928, was recorded December 17, 1929, one year lacking three days subsequent to the filing of the petition for registration of the property by appellants and seven months and seventeen days after the entry of the decree of registration sought to be vacated by respondent. This fact is not contradicted. The question presented for determination is whether under these facts the trial court had any discretion in passing upon the motion and, if so, whether it was abused. In the early case of Roland v. Kreyenhagen, 18 Cal. 455, the facts are strikingly similar to those which are here presented. In a suit to recover possession of certain land the defendant Kreyenhagen, who claimed to be owner, was not served with process. The occupants of the land were served and defaulted, whereupon the action was dismissed as to Kreyenhagen and judgment was entered against the occupants. Kreyenhagen moved to vacate the judgment and for leave to defend. Counter affidavits filed by the plaintiff alleged that subsequent to the entry of judgment plaintiff had sold his interest in the property to a bona fide purchaser without notice. The trial court granted the motion of defendant Kreyenhagen and vacated the judgment. On appeal the order was affirmed. The Supreme Court in its decision adverted to the desirability of having cases tried upon their merits and held that the court had not abused its discretion in vacating the judgment. With respect to the rights of third parties acquired subsequent to entry of judgment the court said: "If third persons have acquired any rights since the judgment, or the respondent waived any, that matter can be set up on the trial. We cannot try these questions on affidavit." In Holiness Church v. Metropolitan Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 445, 107 P. 633, it was held that a defendant upon whom service of process was constructive and not personal is entitled as a matter of absolute right to have a judgment entered against him by default vacated and that the court has no discretion in the premises. In American Land Co. v. Zeiss, 219 U. S. 47, 31 S. Ct. 200, 208, 55 L. Ed. 82, the Supreme Court of the United States, in commenting upon that clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which is involved herein, says: "The right conferred by § 473 of the Code, it is to be observed, is an absolute right, although the section declares that the court may impose 'such terms as may be just.'" In Hoffman v. Superior Court, 151 Cal. 386, 393, 90 P. 939, 942, the Supreme Court of California, in discussing the effect of constructive service of process, says: "In this connection it is proper to say that in determining whether or not due process of law is afforded other statutes applicable to the proceeding may be considered. The provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure apply in such cases. Any person interested in the property and having no actual notice of the decree, may come in at any time within a year after its rendition, and by showing that he has not been personally served with process, and stating facts constituting a good defense to the proceeding —that is, facts sufficient to show that he has a valid adverse interest in the property— he may have the decree vacated as to him and be allowed to answer to the merits. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 P. 691 [12 Ann. Cas. 990]."

In Gray v. Lawlor, supra, the Supreme Court points out the distinction between that clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which authorizes a court to relieve a party from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, and the clause which authorizes a court to allow a defendant who has not been personally served with summons in an action, to answer to the merits of the action at any time within one year after the rendition of judgment. When there has been no personal service of summons upon a defendant it is declared that the defendant need not present any excuse for his failure to appear except the fact that he was not personally served with the summons. The above-cited decisions seem to indicate that in cases where summons has not been personally served upon a defendant the court has no discretion and is required, upon production by such defendant, within one year after rendition of judgment, of an affidavit showing the fact of no personal service of summons in the action, to set aside the judgment and permit the defendant to answer to the merits. The doctrine that a defaulting defendant who has not been personally served with process in an action is entitled as a matter of right to be permitted to plead to the merits of the suit within a period of one year after the rendition of judgment against him and that the court has no discretion, but is required to grant the relief upon a showing that such defendant has not been personally served with process, has received one material modification. In Boland v. All Persons, supra, the court in discussing that clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, which permits the granting of relief to a defendant not personally served with process says: "In applications for relief under this clause of the section there is no presumption of neglect, as in cases where there has been personal service. The party is not required, in the first instance, to do more than show that he has not been personally served and that he has a good defense to the action on the merits which he could have presented had he been informed of its pendency. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 354, 90 P. 691 [12 Ann. Cas. 990]. But his opponent may show in opposition to the application that the applicant had actual notice of the action in time to have entered an appearance and present the defense, and that the failure to do so was owing to his neglect or to his consent to the judgment. In that event a case arises for the exercise of the discretion of the court, and it must determine whether or not the laches is of a character that should preclude the relief. Bogart v. Kiene, 85 Minn. 262, 88 N. W. 748; Mueller v. McCulloch, 59 Minn. 409, 61 N. W. 455; Keenan v. Daniells, 18 S. D. 102, 99 N. W. 853; Blyth v. Swenson, 15 Utah, 352, 49 P. 1027; Jordan v. Hutchinson, 39 Wash. 373, 81 P. 867."

[6] In Palmer v. Lantz et al. (Cal. Sup.) 9 P. (2d) 821, 823, it is said: "Service by publication and mailing a copy of the complaint and summons is not personal service (Lilly-Brackett Co. v. Sonnemann, 157 Cal. 192, 106 P. 715, 21 Ann. Cas. 1279), however, and by reason of this fact appellant contends that under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, he is entitled to be relieved from the default as a matter of right without further showing than that he was not personally served (Daniels v. Colkins, 201 Cal. 10, 255 P. 182, and cases there cited). That this is sufficient to make a prima facie case for relief must be conceded. The law presumes from the fact of constructive service only that the failure to answer is due to lack of notice of the service. Gray v. Lawlor, 151 Cal. 352, 90 P. 691, 12 Ann. Cas. 990. But the provision is not designed to afford relief from a judgment which may be validly entered upon constructive service to those who with full knowledge of such service upon them, by reason of receipt of a copy of the summons and complaint through the mail, remain inactive. Gray v. Lawlor, supra; Boland v. All Persons, 160 Cal. 486, 117 P. 547." It therefore appears that there may be circumstances when the court in passing upon an application for relief under the clause of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, under consideration will be called upon to exercise its discretion. In the instant case, however, no showing was made by appellants that respondent had actual knowledge of the pendency of the action in time to make an appearance and present her defense prior to the rendition of judgment. What was shown is that she failed to record the deed on which she relies for a period of 19 months after it was executed and that, during this period, the proceeding to have the land registered under the Torrens Act was instituted by appellants, a decree quieting their title in the property against all persons was rendered, and the land was sold by them to bona fide purchasers who, at the time the sale was made, paid valuable consideration therefor. The question which then presents itself is whether these circumstances call for the exercise of discretion by the trial court in passing upon respondent's application for relief. We think that they did not. Respondent's neglect to record her deed has no bearing upon her application for relief under the statute. It is a false quantity in the equation. The reasons for the adoption of the modification declared in Boland v. All Persons, supra, and Palmer v. Lantz, supra, is that a showing of actual notice overcomes the inference of lack of notice arising from the fact of constructive service and the court is then called upon to decide whether, under the circumstances, the failure of a defaulting defendant to make timely appearance should preclude the relief. The exercise by the court of its discretion involves a determination of whether the defendant's neglect makes it inequitable to grant the relief. The corner stone of the whole doctrine is the possession of actual notice by the defaulting defendant. This fundamental feature is lacking in the instant case. It is not contended that respondent had actual notice of the proceeding. Her failure to place her deed on record may, upon the trial of the action, be held to constitute laches foreclosing her interest in the property in favor of bona fide purchasers for value without notice but it should not preclude her from being allowed to present her claim to the land. The quotation from Sharp v. Eagle Lake Lumber Co., supra, to the effect that where innocent third parties have acquired interests through or by virtue of a judgment, the more orderly course is to proceed by an independent suit in equity to set aside the judgment, is, in the first place, pure dictum, and in the second place, it does not pretend to declare that, under the circumstances therein stated, an independent suit in equity is the exclusive remedy.

In conclusion, it may be remarked that in the order from which this appeal is taken, the court granted the relief upon the express condition that respondent bring in as parties defendant the present record owners of the property. The imposition of this condition would appear to insure a final adjudication of the merits of the action.

For the reasons herein stated the order from which this appeal is taken is affirmed.

Action by Rodolfo Salinas against the Riverside Finance Company. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order refusing to vacate a default, and a default judgment, defendant appeals.

J. L. Hoffiund, of San Diego, for respondent.

MARKS, J.

This is an appeal from an order refusing to vacate a default and a default judgment, which motion was made under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The action was filed September 8, 1931, and personal service of summons was had on appellant. Its default for failure to appear was taken October 17, 1931. Judgment was rendered after evidence was taken on November 16, 1931. A notice of motion to vacate the default and the judgment on the grounds of mistake, inadvertence, surprise and excusable neglect was filed November 28, 1931, and denied December 14, 1931. This appeal followed.

Appellant has presented a typewritten transcript which is denominated a "Clerk's Transcript," in which is the judgment roll, except the summons, a copy of the minute order denying the motion, a proposed answer, the notice of motion to which three affidavits are attached, the notice of appeal, and certificates by the trial judge and the county clerk. There is no bill of exceptions. The certificates of the judge and the county clerk are so nearly similar to those quoted in Guyot v. Cassab (Cal. App.) 5 P.(2d) 912, that it will be unnecessary to detail them here.

The record in the instant case is so parallel to that in the Guyot Case that it furnishes us with authority for holding here that "the record before us not being authenticated either as required by the rule of court or any provision of the law, we cannot consider it." Guyot v. Cassab, supra. The following authorities support this conclusion: Section 951, Code of Civil Procedure; Clark v. McCain, 107 Cal. App. 668, 290 P. 901; Patterson v. Rutherford, 39 Cal. App. 647, 179 P. 704; Harrison v. Cousins, 16 Cal. App. 515, 117 P. 564; Spreckels v. Spreckels, 114 Cal. 60, 45 P. 1022; Stern & Goodman Investment Co. v. Danziger, 206 Cal. 456, 274 P. 748.

Although the record is imperfect, we have examined it, and have concluded that, if we should consider the appeal on its merits, we would have to affirm the order. While the answer presents a complete defense, if its allegations be taken as true, the record discloses such a lack of diligence on the part of appellant in protecting its rights after the service of summons upon it that we could not hold that the trial judge abused the discretion which the law vests in him in denying the motion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; G. K. Scovel, Judge.

Action by Edward Rainey, by substitution for Will C. Wood, as State Superintendent of Banks, trustee in charge of the liquidation of California Savings & Commercial Bank, in liquidation, against R. A. Jackson. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals.

JENNINGS, J.

Appellant is the superintendent of banks of the state of California, and as such took possession of the property and business of the California Savings & Commercial Bank of San Diego on July 24, 1930. Among the assets of the bank which came into appellant's possession was a promissory note dated May 19, 1930, payable August 18, 1930, in the principal sum of $25,000, signed by respondent. The evidence shows that no payments either on principal or interest had been made on the note. The complaint filed by appellant is in the usual form employed in actions of the character here instituted. Respondent's answer pleaded entire lack of consideration and that the note was executed solely for the accommodation of the bank at the request of its president, I. I. Irwin. The trial court found that there was no consideration for the execution of the note; that it was given with the intention of accommodating the bank, and was not given for the purpose of deceiving bank examiners or to work a fraud on the public; that the execution of the note was procured through fraudulent misrepresentation of I. I. Irwin, president of the bank. From the aforesaid findings the court drew the conclusion that appellant was not entitled to recover from respondent and rendered judgment accordingly.

[1, 2] A brief statement of the facts developed by the evidence may assist in clarifying the problem presented by the appeal herein. On February 29, 1928, I. I. Irwin, president of the California Savings & Commercial Bank of San Diego, proposed to respondent, a stockholder in said bank, that the latter should go through with the formality of purchasing the safety deposit department of the bank. The reason advanced by Irwin for the proposal thus made was that the bank was keeping open its safety deposit department throughout the 24 hours of each day, and that the San Diego Clearing House Association refused to clear the bank's checks because the bank's action in keeping open its safety deposit department for the full 24 hours in each day constituted a violation of a rule of the Clearing House Association which forbade such action. Respondent demurred to the proposal thus made on the ground that he did not have the money with which to make the purchase and had no desire to acquire the safety deposit department of the bank. Respondent was then assured by Irwin that no money was required for the consummation of the scheme; that the money ostensibly necessary would be advanced to respondent by the bank; that respondent would execute his note for the amount representing the purchase price of the safety deposit department and would return to the bank the money advanced to him; that there would be no obligation upon him to pay the note, as the money would always be held available at the bank to offset his note. Upon the aforesaid representations, respondent accepted the proposal. He executed a note for $25,000 payable to the bank. His account with the bank was credited with the sum of $25,000 on the same day, and on this date he drew his check for $25,000 payable to I. I. Irwin. This check bore the following indorsement: "Pay to the order of Calif. Savings & Commercial Bank of San Diego. I. I. Irwin." The original note thus executed by respondent was renewed by him on its due date, and there were successive renewals, the last note given being the one on which the present action was instituted. Payments of interest due on the notes thus given were made by respondent, but his account was consistently credited with sums equivalent to the amounts paid by him as interest on the notes. From the aforesaid facts it sufficiently appears that the hereinabove mentioned findings of the court were fully justified, with the single exception of the finding that "the note was secured by fraudulent misrepresentation of I. I. Irwin, President of the California Savings and Commercial Bank." The testimony of respondent himself shows that he fully understood the nature of the transaction, and that it was purely fictitious; its object being the evasion of the rule of the San Diego Clearing House Association forbidding safety deposit departments of banks being kept open 24 hours in the day.

[3] The problem presented for determination is, therefore, whether upon the facts as above narrated the court was justified in concluding that no liability attached to respondent on the note for $25,000 executed by him and in rendering judgment accordingly. It is appellant's contention that respondent is estopped from raising the defense of lack of consideration against appellant, representing the creditors of the insolvent bank. With this contention we find ourselves impelled to agree. We are of the opinion that the instant case is not distinguishable on principle from the decision in Wood v. Kennedy, 117

Cal. App. 53, 3 P.(2d) 366, decided by this court, in which a hearing was denied by the Supreme Court. While it is true that there is not here present the element of lending credit to the bank for the purpose of ostensibly increasing the bank's assets with the intention of deceiving a bank examiner, an element often found in cases of this character, nevertheless, when respondent executed the note and made successive renewals thereof, he must have known that one certain effect produced thereby would be to increase its assets fictitiously. Since the rights of creditors of the insolvent bank have now intervened, and these innocent third parties will suffer injury if respondent is permitted to set up the true state of facts, a proper case for the application of the doctrine of estoppel is presented. First National Bank v. Reed, 198 Cal. 252, 261, 244 P. 368.

The fundamental reason for the application of the equitable doctrine of estoppel to a situation such as is here presented is because the accommodation maker joins in the perpetration of a scheme which is essentially deceitful. He may do so unwittingly. Nevertheless, the certain effect produced by his action in making the note without consideration and delivering it to the bank is that the bank's assets are ostensibly increased. This ostensible increase is, from the viewpoint of the accommodation maker, purely fictitious. The bank's creditors, however, are ignorant of the true situation. To them the accommodation note represents a real, not a fictitious, asset. They are justified in relying upon the note as being that which on its face it appears to be, a contract by the maker to pay a certain sum of money on a definite date. That the result of sustaining the defense of lack of consideration in a case of the character here presented would be seriously to jeopardize the rights of innocent creditors is apparent. For the sake of illustration, let us suppose the existence of the following facts: A bank on the brink of failure, for the purpose of delaying closing its doors, secures accommodation notes purporting to represent promises to pay large sums of money. Depositors, relying upon these fictitious evidences of indebtedness, continue to make deposits. When the true condition of the bank can no longer be concealed and insolvency occurs, shall the makers of accommodation notes escape liability to the bank's depositors on the ground that they had lent their credit to the bank without receiving any consideration therefor? We apprehend not. The depositors are entitled to say: You lent your credit to the bank, we relied upon your notes as being what they purported to be, true promises to pay; in reliance thereon we continued to make deposits; you may not now be heard to say that your notes were given without consideration and are therefore unenforceable.

[4] One further point remains to be considered. Appellant's complaint contained counts seeking recovery from respondent on two other notes executed by him. There was no denial of liability on these latter notes by respondent, but it was contended that there was no necessity of bringing suit upon them, and that therefore appellant was not entitled to recover costs and attorney's fees upon such notes. The court found that respondent had on deposit with the bank collateral security for the payment of these notes, and offered to pay such notes if appellant would deliver to him the aforesaid collateral security, which appellant refused to do; that appellant had no right to withhold the collateral security; that there was no necessity of bringing suit upon the notes. The evidence with reference to this feature of the case shows that, as collateral security for the payment of these latter notes, there was deposited with the bank a trust deed, the property of respondent, on which there was due to respondent approximately $10,000, and that, after appellant took possession of the assets of the bank, respondent requested that the trust deed be delivered to him, and that he be permitted to collect the money due thereon and pay off the notes; that appellant declined to deliver the trust deed as requested; that there was no actual tender of money by respondent. Since the only evidence bearing on the feature of tender is that no actual tender of money by respondent was made, it remains to consider whether respondent's action in requesting delivery of the trust deed and for permission to collect the money due thereon and from the proceeds pay off the notes amounted to a tender of payment which, while it would not discharge the debt which the notes represented, might relieve him from liability for attorney's fees. Section 3151, Civil Code, provides that, if an instrument is, by its terms, payable at a special place, and the person primarily liable thereon is able and willing to pay it there at maturity, such ability and willingness are equivalent to a tender of payment. But respondent's ability to pay the amounts due on the notes was not made to appear, and his willingness to pay was qualified by the imposition of a condition which appellant was under no duty to perform. An expression of willingness to pay thus qualified is not equivalent to tender of payment. Rottman v. Hevener, 54 Cal. App. 485, 202 P. 334. We are therefore of the opinion that the court's finding that there was no necessity for bringing action upon the notes is not supported by the evidence, and that the court's conclusion that appellant is not entitled to recover attorney's fees is incorrect.

For the reasons stated, the judgment is reversed.

Plaintiffs brought this action to recover a money judgment against defendants. Defendants answered and filed a cross-complaint seeking to recover a money judgment against plaintiffs. The cause was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and, from a judgment in favor of defendants and cross-complainants, the plaintiffs and cross-defendants appeal.

The pleadings are lengthy and reveal that both sides claimed a right of recovery arising out of the somewhat complicated dealings between the parties. From the pleadings and evidence it appears that both plaintiffs and defendants were independently speculating in stocks and owed certain obligations in connection with their operations. They entered into an agreement whereby certain stocks of defendants were turned over to plaintiffs, who in turn executed a declaration of trust in favor of defendants. Plaintiffs thereby agreed that they held said stocks in trust for defendants; that said stocks would be placed "with the Humboldt Bank under its trust investment savings plan"; that all profits thereon would belong to defendants; and that plaintiffs would execute all orders of defendants with respect to the sale or exchange of said stocks. It was further provided by the terms of said declaration of trust that plaintiffs could at their option place certain specified stocks of their own in said trust investment savings plan, and that the provisions relating to defendants' rights to profits, and so forth, should not apply to plaintiffs' stocks. Under the trust investment savings plan, entered into with the Humboldt Bank in the name of plaintiffs alone pursuant to the agreement between plaintiffs and defendants, plaintiffs borrowed the sum of $20,000 from the bank, which loan was secured by said stocks. This money was apparently used to pay off the prior obligations of defendants on said stocks, and, as part of the general agreement between the parties, defendants loaned certain money to plaintiffs to pay off the prior obligations on plaintiffs' stocks. Subsequently some of defendants' stocks so held under the trust investment savings plan were sold upon defendants' orders as agreed, but the controversy here arose out of the alleged unauthorized sale of fifty shares of Los Angeles First National Bank stock belonging to defendants and included in the trust. On November 14, 1928, this stock was sold and a block of General Motors stock was purchased by the bank, all upon instructions from plaintiffs. The main issue on the trial of the cause was whether this sale and purchase was authorized by defendants. The trial court found against plaintiffs on this issue and there is ample evidence to support this finding. Defendants denied any such authorization, and testified that these unauthorized transactions were concealed from them for almost a year despite the fact that they had frequently demanded a statement of their affairs. They further testified to facts showing that plaintiffs had led them to believe that said bank stock was still included in the trust after the sale thereof, and that plaintiffs had endeavored to purchase defendants' entire interest in the trust prior to the time that defendants learned of said unauthorized sale.

The purpose of plaintiffs' action was to obtain judgment against defendants for the balance due on plaintiffs' obligation to the bank under the trust investment savings plan, deducting therefrom the amount which they had borrowed from defendants. They claimed this right under the following provisions of the declaration of trust: "The said Fred Benioff and Helen Benioff, by accepting this declaration of trust, and the benefits thereof, agree to save the said Peter B. Corbett and Josephine Brownlow Corbett, his wife, free and harmless from and indemnify them, and each of them, against any and all claims or demands or losses of any kind or nature arising out of the holding of the said securities, or any replacement thereof, by said Peter B. Corbett and Josephine Brownlow Corbett and/or the said trust investment savings plan agreement and/or any obligation incurred by the said Peter B. Corbett and Josephine Brownlow Corbett in favor of the said Humboldt Bank relating thereto and to the said securities, or any replacement thereof." By the cross-complaint defendants included in their cross-demands against plaintiffs the amount of the proceeds of the unauthorized sale, and claimed that they were entitled to a money judgment against plaintiffs. During the pendency of the action all of the remaining stocks, with the exception of the General Motors stock, were sold by mutual consent of the parties, and proceeds were credited to the amount remaining due to the bank on the original $20,000 note of plaintiffs executed in connection with the trust investment savings plan. Upon the trial the parties entered into a stipulation regarding the amount due in the event that judgment was entered in favor of plaintiffs, and also regarding the amount due in the event that judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. At the conclusion of the trial the court entered judgment in favor of defendants in the amount specified in the stipulation.

[1] Appellants contend that they should not be held answerable for the proceeds of the sale of said bank stock, but we are of the opinion that this contention is without merit. Appellants were not authorized to sell or cause to be sold any of respondents' stocks included in the trust except upon orders from respondents. Their action in causing said bank stock to be sold without any authority from defendants constituted a breach of their trust for which they were liable. In this connection appellants argue that "Respondents must ratify the transaction as a whole or repudiate it as a whole. They cannot accept its benefits and reject its burdens." The point which appellants endeavor to make is that the sale of the stock of the Los Angeles First National Bank and the purchase of the stock of General Motors was a single transaction, and that respondents have ratified the sale by claiming the proceeds thereof and repudiated the purchase. It is a sufficient answer to state that respondents have never ratified either the sale or the purchase. Both were unauthorized, and respondents are merely claiming the amount of the proceeds of the unauthorized sale as the measure of the liability of appellants for the breach of trust. Civ. Code, § 2237.

[2] Appellants further contend that they should not be held liable as "Respondents agreed to save appellants free and harmless and indemnify them against any and all demands and losses whatsoever arising out of the declaration of trust." This contention is based upon the clause of the declaration of trust which is above quoted. In our opinion appellants seek to place an unwarranted construction upon said clause. The language is quite broad, but nothing therein contained leads to the conclusion that it was intended to protect appellants against their own wrongful acts in violation of the trust. The construction contended for would practically relieve appellants from every duty which would be otherwise imposed upon them by the creation of said trust.

[3] Appellants make the further contention that respondents neither alleged nor proved any loss. Our attention is called to section 2238 of the Civil Code, which provides: "A trustee who uses or disposes of the trust property in any manner not authorized by the trust, but in good faith, and with intent to serve the interests of the beneficiary, is liable only to make good whatever is lost to the beneficiary by his error." We need not determine whether the burden was upon appellants to plead and prove that the unauthorized sale of the stock was made in good faith or upon respondents to plead and prove that said unauthorized sale was made in good faith. In our opinion this issue merely affected the measure of damage. Here the parties went to trial upon one main issue, namely, whether the sale of the stock of the Los Angeles First National Bank and the purchase of the General Motors stock was authorized or unauthorized. Before any evidence was introduced, counsel for both sides stipulated upon the amount of the judgment to be entered in favor of appellants in the event that the main issue should be determined in appellants' favor, and also upon the amount of the judgment to be entered in favor of respondents in the event that the main issue should be determined in favor of respondents. This stipulation left no issue of damage before the court and it was followed up by a written stipulation after the trial court had orally announced its decision, which contained, among other things, a provision that "the amount thereof is correct." These stipulations preclude any inquiry upon this appeal regarding the sufficiency of the pleading and proof relating to damage. In 23 California Jurisprudence 826, it is said: "A valid stipulation is, of course, binding upon the parties, and precludes objection to matters concerning procedure and evidence which have been expressly or impliedly agreed upon."

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNARD, P. J.

This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in an action for damages for breach of a contract. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he entered into a contract with the defendant under which he was to haul all ice sold by the defendant in a certain territory during a certain season, also alleging his readiness, willingness, and ability at all times to perform, and that the defendant, without cause, violated the agreement and refused to permit him to do the work. In its answer the defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint.

During the trial the court refused to permit the defendant to introduce evidence going to show that the plaintiff was not available for the work when wanted and tending to show that by his conduct he had given the defendant good cause for discontinuing his services. Evidence along this line was refused on the ground that such matters had not been pleaded as an affirmative defense. Thereupon, the defendant offered an amendment to its answer in which such matters were set up as a defense to the action. Permission to thus amend was refused. That these rulings of the court were erroneous is the main point raised on this appeal.

Were we of the opinion that the proposed amendment was necessary in order to permit the defense indicated, we would feel compelled to hold that the court abused its discretion in refusing permission to amend. As was said in Williams v. Flinn & Treacy, 61 Cal. App. 352, 214 P. 1024, 1026, "It is true that it is only in exceptional cases that the action of the trial court upon a matter of this kind will be disturbed upon appeal, but we think this is such an exceptional case. It is the aim and aspiration of our system of law and the policy of our courts to afford substantial justice to litigants, and to that end liberal amendments are expressly permitted by our Code, and encouraged by our courts. In a case like this one, when a party has presented evidence such as would be sufficient upon which to base a finding in his favor as to his right to certain credits, and this evidence is presented during the course of a comprehensive investigation into the facts and figures, and at a time when the rights of the opposing party can be fully protected by the allowance of a continuance to enable him to meet such proof if he so desires, we can see neither reason nor justice in refusing permission to amend to conform to the proof. Indeed, to allow the plaintiff to recover a large amount in an accounting suit which the evidence has disclosed is not due him, merely because through inadvertence or other excusable neglect the defendant failed to set out in his answer all the credits to which he was entitled would be to settle a controversy without regard to the merits."

A similar rule should apply where, as here, the evidence offered so clearly goes to the merits of the controversy, and where the amendment asked for follows so closely the original pleadings.

However, we think no amendment was here necessary and that the proffered evidence was admissible under the existing pleadings. The defendant's manager, having testified that he had dispensed with the services of the plaintiff, was not permitted to testify as to what was the occasion therefor. Although a formal offer of proof was made, the defendant was not permitted to introduce evidence to the effect that the plaintiff was not available and could not be found at times when his services were wanted; that on certain occasions his services could not be secured; that on a number of such occasions the defendant was forced to hire other people to do the work; and that on some of these occasions the plaintiff refused to come when notified that his services were required. Finally, the defendant was told that no evidence would be permitted which went to show the reasons why the services of the plaintiff were discontinued. By the allegations of the complaint and the answer, direct issues were raised as to whether the plaintiff had been ready, able, and willing to perform his agreement and as to whether the refusal of the defendant to continue the employment had been without cause. The evidence sought to be introduced and formally offered went directly to these issues and its exclusion was error.

The judgment is reversed.

Defendants appeal from a judgment whereby plaintiff recovered damages on account of services rendered to the defendants by plaintiff in the capacity of broker in an exchange of properties between the defendants and third persons.

The first point of law presented by appellants as a compelling reason for a reversal of the judgment is that certain controlling findings of fact made by the trial court were not supported by the evidence. No useful purpose would be subserved by a review by this court of the evidence which was presented by the respective parties for consideration by the trial court. It is enough to state that, after a careful examination of the record herein, this court is of the opinion that the evidence adduced on the trial of the action was amply sufficient to sustain the findings of fact of which complaint is made.

Since each of the other specifications of alleged error presented by appellants depends upon an assumed decision by the court that the evidence was insufficient to support the findings of fact in question, it follows that a consideration of the several additional questions of law raised by appellants becomes unnecessary.

CONREY, P. J.

This action was brought by the plaintiff to recover on a cause of action which, according to the complaint, had been the property of Matthews-Kenney Company, and by assignment of which, it was alleged, the claims of said company, together with its right to sue for and collect the moneys in question, had passed to the plaintiff. Judgment was in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The court found as a fact that said claim or demand never was assigned to the plaintiff and that plaintiff is not the holder thereof. We think that this finding is sustained by the evidence.

In April, 1924, respondent Kenney and one Frank T. Matthews agreed that they would form a corporation under the name of Matthews-Kenney Company, for the purpose of manufacturing clothing, etc. As a preliminary to the creation of such corporation they deposited in the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank the sum of $3,500, of which Kenney furnished $3,000 and Matthews $500. They then proceeded to the organization of a corporation under the name of Matthews-Kenney Company, Inc. The money was deposited in the name, Matthews-Kenney Company, accompanied by the following notation over the signatures of Matthews and Kenney: "Not incorporated. It is mutually understood and agreed that the undersigned are all the copartners and that any and all withdrawals against said account may be made upon the signatures of Frank T. Matthews and David M. Kenney." The present controversy arises out of conflicting claims to ownership of the unexpended portion of said $3,500 fund.

[1] The plaintiff offered in evidence a document made in June, 1926, purporting to assign and transfer to E. M. Bengel all of the right, title, and interest of Matthews-Kenney Company, and of Frank T. Matthews, "in and to all of the money which was heretofore on deposit" in said Hellman Bank in the name of the Matthews-Kenney Company. This purported assignment was signed "Matthews-Kenney Co., by Frank T. Matthews," and by Frank T. Matthews. It was a stipulated fact that in February, 1925, the charter of the Matthews-Kenney Company, Inc., was suspended for nonpayment of taxes. The assignment (assuming that it was an attempted corporation act) was void because at the time of its execution the powers of the corporation were suspended, and also because there is no evidence of authority of Frank T. Matthews to execute such assignment on behalf of the corporation.

[2] But the plaintiff introduced other evidence under which she claims that the right of Matthews-Kenney Company to said money was assigned to her. Charles M. Easton gave testimony to the effect that in November, 1924, in order to secure Easton for moneys advanced by him to the Matthews-Kenney Company, "Frank T. Matthews executed an assignment substantially in the form here as is shown on this assignment I hold here in my hand. It was an assignment to me individually." He further testified concerning the attempted assignment made in June, 1926, as follows: "I had Mr. Matthews execute the second paper (plaintiff's exhibit 16), and I executed one, assigning the claim which I had to Miss Bengel prior to the time the action was started."

We may assume, as does appellant, that the purported assignments were attempted to be made by or on behalf of Matthews-Kenney Company, Inc. Appellant failed to prove a proper or valid authorization for the execution of any assignment to Easton of the corporation's claim to the money in question. Since the court did not err in making its finding against appellant on the issue relating to appellant's ownership of the rights constituting the cause of action, the judgment must be affirmed upon that ground alone. So it becomes unnecessary to enter into a discussion of the other grounds of appeal set forth in the briefs.

The judgment is affirmed.

George Buchanan, in pro. per.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

IRA F. THOMPSON, J.

The defendant was charged by an information containing five counts with that number of offenses of forgery and two prior convictions. He admitted the previous convictions, but pleaded not guilty, and not guilty by reason of insanity. He was found guilty on three counts. Judgment was pronounced, the sentences being made to run concurrently. At the time the defendant was arraigned for judgment on February 24, 1928, he was informed not only of the pleas to the counts of forgery and the verdicts thereon, but also of the allegations of the prior convictions and his admission of them. A motion for a new trial was then made and denied. On the same day as the arraignment, and, in fact, as soon as the motion for new trial was disposed of, the court sentenced the defendant to be confined in the state prison at Folsom for the term prescribed by law. The minutes of the court read with respect to count IV are as follows:

"Whereas said George Buchanan having been already found guilty in this court of the crime of forgery, a felony, as charged in count 4 of the information and having admitted prior convictions of two felonies,

"It is therefore Ordered, Adjudged and Decreed that said George Buchanan be punished by imprisonment in the State Prison of the State of California at Folsom for the term prescribed by law."

The language is identical respecting the other two counts. The record does not disclose the language of the commitment, but on March 17, 1930, an amended commitment reciting the two prior convictions was issued and forwarded to the board of prison directors. On November 24, 1931, the defendant filed a motion to correct the judgment by striking therefrom, as it appeared in the minute book and from the amended commitment, all reference to the prior convictions. The motion was denied, and this appeal is from that order.

The appellant asserted in the lower court and now says that the words "and having admitted prior convictions of two felonies" were not a part of the judgment orally pronounced by the court, and were, in fact, added subsequently by the clerk in his minute entry.

The contention of appellant cannot be sustained. First of all we direct attention to section 1207 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "When judgment upon a conviction is rendered, the clerk must enter the same in the minutes, stating briefly the offense for which the conviction was had, and the fact of a prior conviction, if any, and must, within five days, annex together and file the following papers, which constitute a record of the action: 1. The indictment or information, and a copy of the minutes of the plea or demurrer, and all rulings thereon. 2. A copy of the judgment."

It is to be observed that according to statutory mandate it is the duty of the clerk to note, in the minutes, the fact of a prior conviction, if any. It is well in this connection to call attention to the fact that the guilty person is not punished a second time for the prior offense, but is punished more severely for the offense then before the court. Hence the following language in Ex parte Williams, 89 Cal. 421, 426, 26 P. 887, 889, is pertinent: "It was not necessary that the entry of the judgment in the minutes should repeat the entries that had already been made in previous proceedings in the case. These had already become a part of the record, and would obtain no greater validity by being a second time recited in the minutes. 'From the mere fact that these several papers are taken into and made a part of the record, it is clear that each one was intended merely to tell its own story, or, rather to relate its particular branch of the whole history. Thus, the indictment states the jurisdictional facts, the nature of the offense, and the facts and circumstances so far as they are material. The other papers give the history of the trial, including the verdict; and the judgment, which constitutes the last chapter, merely finishes the account by stating of what offense defendant was finally convicted, and the penalty imposed by the court. The judgment need not, and it was not intended that it should, repeat anything contained in the papers which precede it, for, in view of the fact that they go into the record and make a part of it, such repetition would be idle and serve no useful purpose. The only material parts of a judgment are the statement of the offense for which the defendant has been convicted, omitting therefrom all that is contained in the previous papers, and therefore not necessary to be repeated, and the sentence of the court.' Matter of Ring, 28 Cal. 253."

Recognizing the duty of the clerk to note the prior conviction in his minute entry, we yet fail to find it incumbent upon the judgment to do more than was already done in the instant case.

Another approach which brings us to the same conclusion is illustrated by the case of People v. Kelly, 120 Cal. 271, 52 P. 587, 588, wherein it was held that the failure of the clerk to note the prior conviction "is a mere clerical misprision" not affecting the substantial rights of the defendant.

HOUSER, J.

Defendant, who was a receiver appointed by the trial court, was indicted by the grand jury on six separate counts for the commission by him of the "crime of embezzling public moneys, in violation of section 424 of the Penal Code." A demurrer to the indictment was sustained and the action "dismissed" by order of the trial court. The plaintiff has appealed "from a judgment for the defendant on the demurrer and the order of dismissal."

The pertinent portion of section 424 of the Penal Code, under the provisions of which defendant was indicted, is as follows:

"Each officer of this state, or of any county, city, town, or district of this state, and every other person charged with the receipt, safe-keeping, transfer, or disbursement of public moneys, who * * * without authority of law, appropriates the same, or any portion thereof, to his own use, or to the use of another; * * * is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. * * *"

"The phrase 'public moneys,' * * * includes * * * all moneys * * * held by state, county, district, city, or town officers in their official capacity." Pen. Code, § 426.

[1] It is thus apparent that in a determination of the correctness of the judgment from which the appeal is taken, the questions which may be considered include, first, whether, within the intent of section 424 of the Penal Code, a receiver appointed by the court in a civil action is an officer; and, if so, whether the moneys held by such person as such receiver are "public moneys."

In effect, it is urged by appellant that since by the authorities generally, a receiver is an officer of the court, it necessarily follows that, in its nature, his position complies with the well-recognized requirement that to constitute one an officer of the state, or any subdivision thereof, in his official capacity he must exercise some portion of the sovereign functions of government. In other words, that since the court itself represents the judicial department of the government of the state, and since a receiver is "an arm of the court," the inevitable conclusion must be that a receiver is a part of the judicial machinery of the government, and hence is a public officer within the meaning and intent of the statute.

It would be a useless task, if not an endless one, to attempt to distinguish the numerous cases which have been decided throughout the several jurisdictions of the United States in which the respective facts with relation thereto have been considered and a definition of the term "public officer" has been given; and thus endeavor to harmonize the several conclusions found in such cases with any judgment which should be rendered herein. As is stated in Pacific Finance Corp. v. City of Lynwood, 114 Cal. App. 509, 300 P. 50, 52, 1 P.(2d) 520, "it would be futile to attempt to reconcile the many definitions * * * of 'public officer.' * * *" And in that connection, although by some authorities it has been perhaps loosely declared that a receiver is a public officer, whenever the question has been directly at issue the weight of authority is to the contrary of that so generally announced. It is clear that, based on the argument of plaintiff, any person, such as an executor, an administrator, a guardian, or a referee appointed by the court to assist in the administration of its functions, likewise would be a public officer.

In § 1 of Mechem on Public Officers it is said: "A public office is the right, authority and duty, created and conferred by law, by which for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is vested with some portion of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public. As here used, the word 'office' is to be distinguished from its application to such positions as are at most quasi public only, as the charge or office of an executor, administrator, or guardian. * * *"

In the Matter of Hathaway, 71 N. Y. 238, where the question is considered at length, it was held that a person who had been appointed to act as surrogate in a particular case was not a public officer. In part, the syllabus is as follows: "The term 'public office' as used in the Constitution, has respect to a permanent public trust or employment, to be exercised generally and in all proper cases; it does not include the appointment, to meet special exigencies, of an individual to perform transient, occasional or incidental duties, such as are ordinarily performed by public officers. * * *"

The case of Stevens v. Larwill, 110 Mo. App. 140, 84 S. W. 113, 118, involved the question of whether an administrator of an estate was a public officer. In that connection, the court said: "It is contended, however, that an administrator is a state officer, and as such is included within the meaning of section 12, art. 8, of the Constitution of this state, which declares that 'no person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state, civil or military, who is not a citizen of the United States and who shall [not] have resided in this state one year next preceding his election or appointment.' An administrator belongs to the same class of officers as curators, guardians, receivers, referees, and the like, whose duties are private and concern private interests, and are in no sense of the term public. He is invested with no portion of the sovereign functions of the state, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public, and is therefore not an officer of this state within the meaning of the constitutional provision just quoted. * * *"

The case of Baird v. Lefor, 52 N. D. 155, 201 N. W. 997, 38 A. L. R. 807, is directly in point. It is there held (syllabus) that: "Receiver is not public officer, but is officer of court in sense of agent or representative in holding property over which court may acquire jurisdiction and in disposing of it."

In the course of the opinion, in part, the following appears: "We think that a receiver appointed by a court is not the holder of a civil office within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution. It is true that he is an officer of the court. [Citing authorities.] * * * A receiver is an officer of the court in the sense that he is the agent or representative of the court in holding any property that the court may acquire jurisdiction over and in disposing of the same; the hand and arm of the court through whom the court acts. He is appointed by, and is removable at, the pleasure of the court. He is responsible to no one but the court. His compensation is fixed by the court. He can sue or be sued, but only under the direction and with the permission of the court. His authority comes from the court and in its exercise he has no discretion independent of the court. He exercises none of the powers of civil government. He is no more a civil officer than is an attorney at law, or a guardian, or a referee, or a jury commissioner, or a juryman, or any 'officer' appointed by the court to enable it to properly function as a court."

[2] It is of course manifest that the duties of a receiver in a civil action relate solely to such assets and liabilities as affect private individuals, especially the parties to the particular proceeding in which the receiver is appointed; and that, strictly speaking, he is in nowise concerned with public moneys, in which the entire state is interested. As affects criminal statutes, the policy of the law is to make plain that which is intended to constitute an infraction of its provisions. Where the language employed is ambiguous or doubtful in its intent, a construction of the statute should always be favorable, rather than unfavorable, to any person accused of a violation of the law. In other words, although the common-law rule that penal statutes be strictly construed has no application to the provisions contained in the Penal Code, nevertheless a criminal statute should be construed according to the fair import of its terms. 23 Cal. Jur. 790, 802, and authorities there cited.

Looking to the title of the Penal Code in which is located the particular statute under the provisions of which defendant was accused, it is noted that its heading is "Crimes Against the Revenue and Property of the State." Since it is apparent that a receiver appointed in an ordinary civil action has nothing to do with the "revenue and property of the state," but that his duties and activities are necessarily confined to an administration of the business affairs of private individuals, it would seem clear that within the meaning and intent of the statute, in accordance with the law as announced in the authorities to which attention has been directed, a receiver is not a public officer, nor engaged in the handling of "public moneys."

It follows that the judgment and the order from which the appeal is taken should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. McGOWAN.

Cr. 1211.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 17, 1932.

Criminal law ⇐97(1).

California court could not try defendant for burglary committed outside state, though it could try such defendant for larceny for bringing within state property taken in burglary (Pen. Code, § 27, subd. 2; §§ 459, 497, 777, 786, 789).

Court within state could not try defendant for burglary committed in another state because the burglary was a completed offense in the state where it was committed; and while asportation of stolen goods into state where defendant was tried constituted a larceny, such offense as regards jurisdiction of courts within state was a distinct separate offense from the burglary committed without the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Lyle Clyde McGowan was convicted of burglary, and he appeals.

Reversed.

G. Fletcher Dodd, of Crescent City, and John F. Quinn, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary upon two counts contained in an information filed against him by the district attorney of Del Norte county. The information contains four counts. The defendant was acquitted on counts 1 and 3, and convicted on counts 2 and 4. From the judgment of conviction based upon counts 2 and 4, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Count 2 is in the following words and figures, to wit: "The District Attorney of the said County of Del Norte, State of California, hereby accuses Lyle Clyde McGowan of a felony, to-wit, burglary, in that on or about the 24th day of July, 1931, at Pistol River Bridge, Curry County, State of Oregon, he wilfully, unlawfully and feloniously entered a certain building known as the Oregon State Highway Commissioner Tool Shed, with the intent then and there in him, said Lyle Clyde McGowan, to commit petit theft therein, and that said Lyle Clyde McGowan did then and there bring and transport into the County of Del Norte, State of California, the personal property of said Oregon State Highway Commission, which he, said defendant, had then and there stolen by means of said burglary, to-wit: 15 gallons of Fuller's Imperial Graphite paint; four lengths of rope; 2 cans of Japan Drier; 4 long-handled wire brushes; 1 hack saw; 2 cardorundum stones; 1 can spirits of turpentine; one pair of overalls, and one can Fuller's Imperial Graphite; all of which is contrary to the form, force and effect of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the People of the State of California."

Count 4 of the information charges the commission of a burglary by the defendant on or about the same date, and at Wedderburn, in Curry county, state of Oregon, in that he entered a building known as the Mercer-Fraser Company Tool Shed, to commit petty larceny, and that he did then and there steal a chest of tools belonging to one Arthur Hanseth, and thereafter transported the same into the county of Del Norte.

The defendant's appeal is based upon the sole ground that in so far as the offense of burglary is concerned, it was a completed offense in the state of Oregon, and that over such an offense the courts of California have no jurisdiction; that while asportation of the stolen goods into the county of Del Norte would, with each removal or movement of the goods, constitute larceny, on the theory that every asportation thereof constitutes offense of larceny, it is, so far as the jurisdiction of the courts of this state may be concerned, a distinct and separate offense from the crime of burglary wholly committed in the state of Oregon.

At common law the essential elements of the offense of burglary are: "A breaking and entry, of the dwelling house, or other structure belonging to another, with intent to commit a felony therein." 9 C. J. 1009.

Section 459 of the Penal Code enlarges somewhat on the definition, and is as follows: "Every person who enters any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse or other building, tent, vessel, railroad car, mine, or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary."

By both the common law and the statutes of this state the breaking and entry of the building or structure belonging to another, with intent to commit some crime, is the constituent element of the offense. It is not necessary that any larceny be committed; it is not necessary that any felony be committed; the breaking and the entry, with intent, constitutes the crime.

It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the effect that the courts of this state have no jurisdiction over completed offenses committed in other states. It is only when the offense committed is a continuing offense, or one which reaches across boundary lines, that jurisdiction is given. Thus, if the one who commits the offense of burglary also commits larceny by stealing property, brings that stolen property across the boundary line, the offense of larceny is continued from the adjoining state into this state, and the superior court of any county into which the stolen property is brought may take jurisdiction of the offense committed in such county, to wit, the offense of larceny, not the offense of burglary.

Subdivision 2 of section 27 of the Penal Code, specifying who are liable to punishment, reads: "All who commit any offense without this state which, if committed within this state, would be larceny, robbery, or embezzlement under the laws of this state, and bring the property stolen or embezzled, or any part of it, or are found with it, or any part of it, within this state." Recognizing, again, the principle that the bringing of the stolen property within the jurisdiction of this state constitutes an offense within itself. The offense of burglary committed in another state is not mentioned in the section for the simple reason that burglary has a distinct situs and does not move with the asportation of the stolen property.

Section 497 of the Penal Code further amplifies the description of the offense of larceny when committed in another state. That section reads: "Every person who, in another state or country steals or embezzles the property of another, or receives such property knowing it to have been stolen or embezzled, and brings the same into this state, may be convicted and punished in the same manner as if such larceny, or embezzlement, or receiving, had been committed in this state." Jurisdiction to punish such an offense is set forth in section 789 of the Penal Code, as follows: "The jurisdiction of a criminal action for stealing or embezzling, in any other state, the property of another, or receiving it knowing it to have been stolen or embezzled, and bringing the same into this state, is in any county into or through which such stolen or embezzled property has been brought."

Respondent calls our attention to section 786 of the Penal Code, which provides as follows: "When property taken in one county by burglary, robbery, larceny, or embezzlement, has been brought into another, the jurisdiction of the offense is in either county. But if at any time before the conviction of the defendant in the latter, he is indicted in the former county, the sheriff of the latter county must, upon demand, deliver him to the sheriff of the former." Here, the term "burglary" is used, but the jurisdiction is confined to the respective counties of the state. All the other sections to which we have referred relate to property brought from some place without the state.

Section 786, supra, purports to and does only deal with an offense committed in one county, and the taking of property from the county where the property is obtained and the bringing of it into another county. Under our Constitution the venue of any offense committed within the state is subject to legislative determination. Section 7 of article 1 of the Constitution guarantees the right of trial by jury, but does not specify that the trial by jury shall be in any particular place. Section 777 of the Penal Code fixes the place of trial, providing that every public offense shall be punished in the county where it is committed, except as otherwise provided in the Codes. Thus, while states having different constitutional provisions have held that Legislatures have no authority to provide a place of trial other than the county in which it is committed, they do not apply, and therefore we do not need to review the cases on this subject cited by the appellant.

As to larceny, the rule is different from burglary, and is very clearly stated in 4 Ruling Case Law, p. 236, to wit: "As to the venue in cases of larceny it has been held that the defendant can be tried either in the county where the offense was committed or in the county to which the goods have been removed. This is on the theory that each asportation of the stolen property constitutes a new theft, thereby making the crime a continuing crime." As we have stated, there being no constitutional provision in this state limiting venue to the county where the offense is committed, the Legislature has full power in this particular, and has provided therefor as we have stated in the sections of the Code set forth herein. The only change in the law relative to the venue in burglary cases is the provision allowing prosecution in different counties of the state where the burglary has been committed in one county and the property carried into another. The statute, however, goes no further than providing for jurisdiction of burglaries committed within the state. A clear statement of this is found in 4 California Jurisprudence, 736, where the text reads: "At common law the crime of burglary, like crimes generally, was considered altogether local, and was cognizable and punishable exclusively in the jurisdiction where committed. In California, however, it is provided by statute that where a burglary is committed in one county, and the property taken is brought into another county, the Superior Court of the latter county has jurisdiction of the offense." The text then sets forth the manner in which the offense must be pleaded if the prosecution is had in the county into which the stolen property is asported.

The cases of People v. Tyree, 21 Cal. App. 701, 132 P. 784, and People v. Jochinsky, 106 Cal. 638, 39 P. 1077, have to do only with offenses wholly committed within the boundaries of this state, and are not authorities for reading into the sections which we have quoted, language not therein found, in order to extend the jurisdiction over offenses wholly committed without the state.

Nor is the case of People v. Ellis, 204 Cal. 39, 266 P. 518, applicable to any of the facts here involved. In the Ellis Case the defendant was charged with bigamy. The act which constituted the crime of bigamy was wholly committed within this state. The defendant was a married man, having been married in another state; came to this state, and went through a marriage ceremony with another woman. This constituted a complete offense within this state, as we find by section 281 of the Penal Code: "Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries any other person * * * is guilty of bigamy." The first marriage was no part of the crime. The offense was wholly confined to the second marriage, and that, having taken place in this state, gave the local court jurisdiction.

It follows from what we have said that although the trial court had jurisdiction to try the defendant for larceny by reason of the alleged asportation of the stolen goods from the state of Oregon to the state of California, and the county of Del Norte, it did not, by reason of any such facts, have jurisdiction to try the defendant for an offense wholly committed within the state of Oregon.

The order and judgment are reversed.

ROBERTS v. HENDERSON et al.

Civ. 988.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Oct. 15, 1932.

Mortgages ⊂=600(2).

Mortgage foreclosure purchasers, not furnishing redemptioner verified statement of amount due on demand during redemption period, cannot collect interest after expiration thereof (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 707, 2074; Civ. Code, §§ 1496, 1504, 3517).

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter J. Desmond, Judge.

Action by Belle McCord Roberts against H. O. Henderson and others. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions.

W. A. Alderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

MARKS, J.

Respondents H. O. Henderson and Louisa P. Henderson held a mortgage on property in the city of Long Beach, which they were compelled to foreclose and which they bid in at the foreclosure sale for $35,000. R. E. Allen was the commissioner who made the sale. Before the redemption period expired on December 28, 1928, appellant acquired assignments of the redemptioners' right to redeem and received quitclaim deeds to the property. The property was rented for a substantial sum, and on December 8, 1928, appellant served on Mr. and Mrs. Henderson a notice that she had acquired the right to redeem the property and desired to do so. She demanded of them a verified statement of the amount necessary to redeem with a statement of the credits and debits to be made on the $35,000, consisting of rents received and taxes and other proper expenditures made by them. Such a statement is authorized by section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial court found that no such verified statement was furnished appellant, and that she was at all times since December 8, 1928, ready, willing, and able to redeem the property from the foreclosure sale. On December 29, 1928, appellant served a notice on R. E. Allen informing him that she had acquired the right to redeem the property; that she had served the notice on Mr. and Mrs. Henderson; that they had refused to furnish her a verified statement of the amount necessary to redeem, and demanded of him that he refuse to execute the commissioner's deed to Mr. and Mrs. Henderson. The deed was delivered the same day, and this action was then commenced to cancel the deed and compel a redemption of the property.

The trial court found all facts in favor of appellant, and gave judgment canceling the deed and fixing the sum of $63,826.10 as the amount necessary to redeem the property. This sum included $25,000 paid by Mr. and Mrs. Henderson to release the property from the lien of a prior mortgage, interest on $35,000 at 12 per cent. per annum for the full year of the redemption, and at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum thereafter up to April 1, 1930, and at the same rate on $63,826.10 after judgment until paid. Appellant complains solely of the allowance of interest on the $35,000 after the expiration of the redemption period. The case comes before us on the judgment roll alone.

Section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides in part as follows: "* * * When any rents or profits have been received by the judgment creditor or purchaser, or his or their assigns, from the property thus sold preceding such redemption, the amounts of such rents and profits shall be a credit upon the redemption-money to be paid; and if the redemptioner or judgment debtor, before the expiration of the time allowed for such redemption, demands in writing of such purchaser or creditor, or his assigns, a written and verified statement of the amounts of such rents and profits thus received, the period for redemption is extended five days after such sworn statement is given by such purchaser or his assigns, to such redemptioner or debtor. If such purchaser or his assigns shall, for a period of one month from and after such demand, fail or refuse to give such statement, such redemptioner or debtor may bring an action in any court of competent jurisdiction, to compel an accounting and disclosure of such rents and profits, and until fifteen days from and after the final determination of such action, the right of redemption is extended to such redemptioner or debtor."

It is the contention of appellant that, since the trial court found "that at all said times she was ready, willing and able to redeem said property as said successor in interest; that in order for her to do it it was necessary that she be informed as to the amount of the rents and profits received during said year by said purchasers from said property; that if she had been informed of the amount of said rents and profits she could and would have paid to the defendants H. O. Henderson and Louisa P. Henderson, said purchasers, the full amount which they were entitled to receive in the exercise of said right of redemption," she was prevented from making the redemption and paying Mr. and Mrs. Henderson the money necessary to redeem. As a conclusion from this, she contends that she should not be charged any interest on $35,000 after December 28, 1928, as this would be permitting Mr. and Mrs. Henderson to profit by their own wrong in failing to furnish her the verified statement of the amount necessary for the redemption.

The question thus presented seems to be of first impression in California. Appellant cites dicta in the cases of Benson v. Bunting, 141 Cal. 462, 75 P. 59, and Webb v. Vercoe, 201 Cal. 754, 258 P. 1099, 54 A. L. R. 1200, in support of her position. These actions were not statutory actions to redeem under the provisions of section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure, but were actions under the general equity powers of the court, and were commenced after the time for redemption had expired. Benson v. Bunting, 127 Cal. 532, 59 P. 991, 78 Am. St. Rep. 81; Bunting v. Haskell, 152 Cal. 426, 93 P. 110.

Section 1504 of the Civil Code provides that an offer of payment duly made stops the running of interest. Section 1496 of the same Code provides: "The thing to be delivered, if any, need not in any case be actually produced, upon an offer of performance, unless the offer is accepted." Section 2074 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "An offer in writing to pay a particular sum of money * * * is, if not accepted, equivalent to the actual production and tender of the money." While it is true that the record discloses no direct offer to pay the amount necessary to redeem the property, such an offer could not be made by appellant, as the amount which she would be required to pay was unknown by her, but was known by Mr. and Mrs. Henderson. The demand which she served on them was to obtain knowledge of this amount, and the trial court held that, if she had obtained this knowledge, she would have paid them "the full amount they were entitled to receive." It then follows that the real reason the money for a redemption was not paid or at least actually tendered was because of the failure of Mr. and Mrs. Henderson to make the verified statement required of them by section 707 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It is a familiar rule of equity that "no one can take advantage of his own wrong." Section 3517, Civ. Code. This section has been variously applied by our courts. Southern Pacific Co. v. Grangers' Business Ass'n., 115 Cal. App. 256, 1 P.(2d) 477; Eberhard v. Pacific S. W. Loan & Mtg. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 9 P.(2d) 302; Mathews v. Wilson, 38 Cal. App. 148, 175 P. 647; England v. Winslow, 196 Cal. 260, 237 P. 542; Brazil v. Silva, 181 Cal. 490, 185 P. 174. We have concluded that this section supports the contention of appellant that to permit Mr. and Mrs. Henderson to collect any interest on the $35,000 after the expiration of the original redemption period on December 28, 1928, would be permitting them to take advantage of their own wrong and cannot be supported. Appellant makes no point on the interest allowed on the balance of the $63,826.10, and this question has not been considered by us.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to deduct from the sum of $63,826.10 found necessary to redeem the property the portion representing interest on $35,000 after December 28, 1928, and to enter judgment as before, permitting the appellant to redeem the property within the statutory period for the sum thus found as necessary to effect the redemption.

McKEE v. STRONG.

Civ. 8437.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

1. Divorce ⇐172.

Finding in divorce decree that mother had abandoned minor children was sufficient on which to predicate such finding in guardianship proceedings (Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32).

2. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1).

Finding of trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appellate court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Application by Louise May Strong for appointment as guardian of the persons and estates of Fay Louise Strong and others. From an order granting the petition, Ida Fay McKee appeals.

Affirmed.

Phi. O. Clough, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Beardsley & Beardsley, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J.

[1] This is an appeal from an order granting a petition made by the aunt of minors under fourteen years of age, by which order said aunt was made the guardian of the persons of said minors. No appeal is taken from that portion of the order which made the said aunt the guardian of the estate of all of said minors, and of the person of the minor who was over the age of fourteen years. The appeal is prosecuted by the mother of the children, who specifies insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, in that there is no evidence proving, or tending to prove, that the said appellant, Ida Fay McKee, had abandoned or deserted the said four minor children. A decree of divorce between appellant and the father of the children, who is now deceased, was introduced into evidence, in which decree such a finding was made and which finding is sufficient upon which to predicate the finding of the court in the present case. Subdivision 32, § 1963, Code of Civil Procedure: "All other presumptions are satisfactory, if uncontradicted. They are denominated disputable presumptions, and may be controverted by other evidence. The following are of that kind: * * * 32. That a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature."

Appellant also contends that the evidence is insufficient to prove that she is now unfit or incompetent to have the care, custody, and control of the said minor children. This also is covered by the findings in the decree of divorce, above mentioned.

[2] Appellant also contends that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding by the court that petitioner, Louise May Strong, is more competent and better fitted to have the custody and control of said children than is the appellant. The evidence introduced upon this subject was highly conflicting, and therefore the finding of the trial court is conclusive upon an appellate court.

The judgment and order appealed from is affirmed.

Civ. 8648.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

1. Judgment ⇐585(4).

Where, by cross-bill, defendants claimed legal title and tendered issue regarding plaintiff's interest, which plaintiff in action to quiet title refused to accept, judgment for cross-complainant held bar to plaintiff's subsequent action to foreclose mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Genevieve H. White against Charles Lantz, as administrator of the estate of Walter I. Wilson, deceased, and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Winslow P. Hyatt and H. P. Hibbard, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hugh A. McNary, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

GRAY, Justice pro tem.

The complaint, which contains only the usual allegations, essential for that purpose, prays the foreclosure of a mortgage, given on May 5, 1916, by decedent to respondent, during their marriage, as security for the payment weekly of specified sums, in full settlement of all her claims and demands against him and his estate. The answer, among other defenses, pleads as a bar to recovery a final decree granted on September 27, 1928, in a prior action between the same parties, adjudging that title in fee simple to the mortgaged premises was vested in decedent's heirs, subject to administration; that all claims of respondent therein were invalid; and that respondent be estopped from asserting any claim thereto. On this issue the trial court found: "That that certain action No. 235,394 in the above entitled Superior Court, wherein Genevieve H. White was plaintiff and Charles Lantz as Administrator of the Estate of Walter I. Wilson, deceased, was defendant, (1) which said action was brought for the purpose of quieting title to the property described in plaintiff's mortgage, (2) is not a bar to plaintiff's action to foreclose her said mortgage, (3) that said mortgage was not mentioned in the pleadings, findings or judgment in the matter of said action No. 235,394, (4) nor was said mortgage an issue in said case, (5) nor were plaintiff's rights under said mortgage adjudicated and (6) that said action No. 235,394 involves a controversy entirely separate and apart from that in the case at bar." (Numerals inserted for subsequent reference.) If the evidence established this defense, the finding is erroneous and the decree of foreclosure must be reversed.

As the only evidence introduced upon this issue was the judgment roll in the prior action, the sole question for determination is the legal effect of that decree upon respondent's interest as mortgagee. An examination of the judgment roll shows that the pleadings, findings, and judgment are each in the usual form, common to ordinary quiet title actions, and that, therefore, parts 1 and 3 of the finding, which state the purpose of the action and the absence of mention of the mortgage in either the pleadings, findings, or judgment, are true. It is also true (part 4) that the mortgage was not expressly and specifically an issue, although the issues of ownership and adverse claims were broad enough to have permitted consideration of the mortgage. Likewise it is true (part 5) that respondent's rights under the mortgage were not expressly adjudicated, but whether they were included within the larger adjudication that she had no interest in the mortgaged property is a legal question to be hereafter considered. The sixth part of the findings to the effect that the quiet title action involved a controversy entirely separate and apart from that in the foreclosure suit is true in the sense that different causes of action were stated, but it is not true in the sense that the rights of the parties in the property were not involved in both actions. See Green v. Thornton, 130 Cal. 482, 62 P. 750. The second portion, finding that the decree quieting title was not a bar to the foreclosure of the mortgage, is really a deduction from the other facts, whose correctness will be determined by a consideration of the legal effect of such facts.

"In an action to quiet title, all matters affecting the title to the parties to the action may be litigated and determined, and the judgment therein is final and conclusive. A general finding of title in the plaintiff, and consequently of no title in the defendant, is a conclusive and binding decision against the defendant on the question of title, from whatever source it may be derived, and forever estops him from asserting a claim which existed at the time of the finding and judgment." Black on Judgments, § 664; Freeman on Judgments, § 874. "Action to Quiet Title—In this form of action all matters affecting the title of the parties to the action may be litigated and determined, and the judgment is final and conclusive, and cuts off all claims or defenses of the losing party going to show title in himself, and which existed at the time of suit, whether pleaded therein or not." 34 C. J. 959. "Where the right, title, or ownership of property is directly put in issue, whether by the pleadings or the course of the litigation, and is tried and determined, the judgment is conclusive thereon in all further litigation between the same parties or their privies, whatever may have been the nature or purpose of the action in which the judgment was rendered or of that in which the estoppel is set up." Rauer v. Rynd, 27 Cal. App. 556, 150 P. 780, 782. A judgment necessarily affirming the existence of any fact is conclusive upon the parties whenever the existence of that fact is again in issue between them, not only when the subject-matter is the same, but when the point comes incidentally in question in relation to a different matter in the same or any other court. Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 354, 212 P. 622.

A decree quieting plaintiff's title against defendant's testator estops such defendant in a second quiet title action from asserting title adverse to plaintiff, anterior to the entry of the decree. Riverside Land, etc., Co. v. Jensen, 108 Cal. 146, 41 P. 40. A plaintiff in an action to declare a deed a mortgage and to quiet title is estopped by a prior judgment in ejectment in which title to the property was put in issue and adjudged to be in the defendant. Wehle v. Price, 202 Cal. 394, 260 P. 878. This case cites numerous authorities to the effect that an adjudication of title estops the loser from subsequently litigating a claim existing at the time of such adjudication but not actually litigated therein. In holding that a final judgment in partition, adjudging that plaintiffs had no lien on lands awarded to defendant, estopped them from asserting, in a subsequent action, a lien on such lands for defendant's share of the cost of redeeming the unpartitioned lands from the foreclosure of a joint mortgage, although such lien had not been litigated in the partition action, the court, in Ivancovich v. Weilenman, 144 Cal. 757, 78 P. 268, 269, said: "The rule is well settled that a judgment between the same parties is conclusive, not only as to the subject-matter in controversy in the action upon which it is based, but also in all cases involving the same question, and upon all matters involved in the issues which might have been litigated and decided in the case; the presumption being that all such issues were met and decided. Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 177, 68 P. 597; Quirk v. Rooney, 130 Cal. 511, 62 P. 825." A decree quieting defendant's title in a former action in which plaintiff claimed his deed was a mortgage is res adjudicata in a second action in which plaintiff asserts such deed was a deed of trust. Albertson v. MacFarlane, 54 Cal. App. 50, 201 P. 479. A final judgment in partition is a conclusive determination upon all parties as to whatever title or claim to the land they had at the time of the rendition of the judgment and precludes them from subsequently asserting any right or claim to the land which they acquired prior to the rendition of the judgment. Christy v. Spring Valley W. W., 97 Cal. 21, 31 P. 1110. The validity of a lease which might have been but was not offered in support of a plea of right of possession in an action of ejectment is adjudged against the tenant by the landlord's recovery. Flynn v. Hite, 107 Cal. 455, 40 P. 749. A party cannot relitigate title to property involved in the former judgment, notwithstanding he failed to assert his claim properly or to present the proper evidence in the first action. Keller v. McGilliard, 5 Cal. App. 395, 90 P. 483.

[1] Respondent's claim of ownership and denial of any interest in appellant, as alleged in her complaint to quiet title, is inconsistent with her present claimed interest as mortgagee. Simmons v. Rowe, 4 Cal. App. 752, 89 P. 621; 20 C. J. 12. Appellant's allegation in his cross-complaint in the quiet title action that respondent claimed an adverse interest, without right, tendered an issue which respondent should have met by the assertion, in her answer, of her interest under the mortgage. Since it is not the policy of the law to permit the trial, by piecemeal, of claims to real property, respondent, by failing to avail herself of the offered opportunity to litigate the mortgage, cannot withdraw such mortgage from inclusion within the determination of the decree quieting title that she has no interest in the mortgaged property. It would appear from the above authorities that the legal effect of the decree quieting title was an adjudication that respondent had no interest as mortgagee and therefore the above finding that such decree is not a bar to the present action is erroneous.

[2] Respondent, in addition to her argument as to the effect of the decree as res adjudicata, also argues (1) that, since only legal interests are involved in a quiet title action, she could not set up her mortgage, and (2) since equity will not quiet title even against an outlawed mortgage, the only way in which the mortgage could be discharged would be by voluntary release or payment. It may be conceded that respondent, as the owner of an equitable interest as mortgagee, could not maintain a quiet title action. But here appellant by his cross-complaint sued as legal owner against the equitable claim of respondent as mortgagee. The legal owner of land may maintain an action to quiet title against a mortgage claimed to be invalid. Withers v. Jacks, 79 Cal. 297, 21 P. 824, 12 Am. St. Rep. 143. The cross-complaint having tendered the issue of title and all adverse claims thereto, the court was authorized to determine the same. Gunst v. Zimdars, 89 Cal. App. 37, 264 P. 544. It was respondent's duty to have pleaded the mortgage if she wished the court to have protected her rights. Lange v. Geiser, 138 Cal. 682, 72 P. 343. Of course, if the mortgage had been presented to the court, it could not have quieted title without protecting the lien of the mortgage. Chapman v. Hicks, 41 Cal. App. 158, 182 P. 336.

Since the judgment must be reversed because the decree quieting title was a bar to this foreclosure, it is unnecessary to consider other objections urged by appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Corporations ⇐78.

Lapse of 143 days from date of stock subscription agreement to date of incorporation and failure of articles of incorporation to recite facts of defendant's subscription rendered agreement unenforceable, under circumstances (St. 1917, p. 679, § 12; p. 685, § 25, as amended by St. 1925, p. 972; St. 1917, p. 674, § 2, subd. 6, now subd. 7, as amended by St. 1925, p. 963).

Subscription agreement was unenforceable, notwithstanding defendant had made deliveries of merchandise in pursuance of the agreement which was payable in merchandise, since St. 1917, p. 685, § 25, as amended by St. 1925, p. 972, requiring incorporation within 90 days, became a part of the agreement and as the corporation was permitted to issue stock for cash only, stock issued in violation of the permit would be void under St. 1917, p. 679, § 12, and p. 674, § 2, subd. 6, now subd. 7, as amended by St. 1925, p. 963.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by D. C. Herkner against Alexander Rubin, doing business under the name and style of the Better Hat Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Livingston & Livingston, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leo H. Shapiro, Harry K. Wolff, and Norman Sanford Wolff, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM.

This is an action to recover the sum of $3,000 upon an agreement for the purchase of certain preferred capital stock of Lubin, Inc., a corporation.

The corporation became insolvent, and certain of its creditors procured judgments against it, upon which executions issued. These were returned wholly unsatisfied, and the claims were subsequently assigned to plaintiff, who is also a judgment creditor.

The subscription agreement reads as follows: "March 24, 1926. I agree to take $3,000 worth of pref. stock paying 6 per cent dividend in the J. Lubin Stores Inc. as explained by J. Lubin. It is understood that I pay for the above in trade. Better Hat Co., Alexander Rubin."

According to the findings Lubin, Inc., was incorporated under the laws of California on August 16, 1926, and the above agreement was executed on the day it bears date. On August 18, 1926, the corporation for the first time applied to the commissioner of corporations for permission to issue to the defendant for cash the stock called for in the agreement. A permit to do so in accordance with the application was issued on September 7, 1926, upon the condition that the stock was escrowed in conformity with the terms of the permit. It was also found that the corporation at no time pursuant to the terms of the permit issued said stock to defendant. The articles of incorporation filed did not contain defendant's name as a subscriber for the stock. The permit issued authorized the corporation to sell its stock upon certain terms and conditions, those material here being as follows: "To sell and issue to the 22 persons named in its application an aggregate of not to exceed 1,000 shares of its class A preferred capital stock at par for cash lawful money of the United States for the uses and purposes recited in its application and so as to net applicant the full amount of the selling price thereof." The court further found that the corporation failed to comply with the permit in that it did not sell and issue to defendant any shares for cash lawful money, or have approved by the commissioner a depositary to hold the stock authorized to be issued, and that no part thereof was escrowed as provided in the permit.

Defendant after the incorporation of the company and pursuant to the agreement mentioned delivered to it merchandise of the value of $1,595.45. Since November 12, 1926, the company has been insolvent, and on April 19, 1927, the permit was suspended by the commissioner of corporations.

From the facts found the court concluded that the stock subscription agreement was not enforceable. Accordingly a judgment in favor of defendant was entered, from which plaintiff has appealed.

By the Corporate Securities Act a company, except as authorized by certain specific statutory provisions not applicable here, was forbidden to sell, offer for sale, negotiate for the sale of or take subscriptions for any security of its own issue, without procuring a permit from the commissioner of corporations permitting it to do so. A security was defined therein as including "all shares or other interests or rights into which the capital, capital stock, or property of companies or rights of stockholders or members thereof are divided * * *" (section 2, subd. 7, St. 1925, p. 962); and by section 12 of the act any security issued by a company without such permission was declared to be void (St. 1917, p. 673). An amendment to the act adopted in 1925 (St. 1925, pp. 962, 972) provided that "neither this act nor any provision hereof shall be deemed to prohibit subscriptions for shares of a domestic corporation made prior to the incorporation thereof and set forth in the articles of incorporation; but such subscription shall be deemed to have been made and accepted upon the condition that such corporation shall be incorporated within ninety days thereafter and, when incorporated, shall with reasonable diligence apply for and secure from the commissioner a permit authorizing the issue of the shares so subscribed for, in accordance with such subscriptions. * * *"

[1] Here the findings show a lapse of 143 days from the date of the subscription agreement to that of incorporation, and also that the articles of incorporation failed to recite the facts of defendant's subscription.

It has been held that under such circumstances the statute becomes a part of the subscription agreement, and unless the conditions are complied with a subscription agreement is not enforceable. First Nat. Bank of Calexico v. Thompson, 212 Cal. 388, 298 P. 808; Rossi v. Jedlick, 115 Cal. App. 230, 1 P.(2d) 1065.

Plaintiff concedes that the statutory requirements were not met, but contends that the agreement having been valid when executed, as was found by the trial court, and deliveries of merchandise pursuant thereto having been made after the company was incorporated, this was tantamount to an election to adopt its terms and conditions as those of a new subscription agreement, and that defendant is consequently liable. That such facts standing alone might have the effect claimed finds support in Moore v. Moffatt, 188 Cal. 1, 204 P. 220, where, notwithstanding a subscription agreement was executed previous to the procurement of a permit required by the Investment Companies' Act (St. 1913, p. 715), a valid permit was subsequently obtained, and pursuant thereto the stock was issued and accepted. But in the case at bar the subscription agreement provided for payment in merchandise, and the application was for permission "to sell and issue one thousand (1,000) shares of class A preferred stock for the par value thereof, to wit, one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, to net the corporation one hundred per cent (100%)," and the permit obtained provided that the same should be sold "at par for cash lawful money of the United States and so as to net applicant the full amount of the selling price thereof."

[2] The resolution adopted by the directors of the corporation authorizing the issuance of the stock provided that the same should be sold for cash, and a copy of the resolution was filed with the commissioner. The only portion of the application which might have directed the commissioner's attention to the plan the organizers of the corporation apparently had in mind was the following: "The bulk of said stock will be issued to persons who are stockholders in said J. J. Milburn & Co., and the balance will be issued to parties from whom new merchandise is to be purchased for sale in said business as aforesaid." This did not clearly disclose their intention, but the company's representative who presented the application testified that he explained to the commissioner that no cash would be actually received from certain of the subscribers, but merchandise in lieu thereof. According to the testimony of the corporation commissioner he did not understand that such was to be the case, otherwise the permit would not have been drawn in the form in which it issued. The statements in the application were by no means plain, and the question was one for the trial court. The evidence was sufficient to support its conclusion that the commissioner's permit expressed exactly his determination upon the facts presented to him. It is admitted that the permit was never modified and that no other was procured. The stock was not issued in conformity with the permit; and where such is the case section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act declared the same to be void, and section 13 of the same act (as amended by St. 1925, p. 970) that any company so issuing its stock would be guilty of a public offense.

[3-5] Where a statute prohibits or attaches a penalty to the doing of an act the act is void (Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14); and this is true of an issuance of stock in violation of the permit granted by the corporation commissioner (Boss v. Silent Drama Syndicate, 82 Cal. App. 109, 255 P. 225; Live Oak Cemetery Ass'n v. Adamson, 106 Cal. App. (Supp.) 783, 288 P. 29; Commercial Building Co. v. Levy, 108 Cal. App. 54, 290 P. 1048, 1049; Otten v. Riesener Chocolate Co., 82 Cal. App. 83, 254 P. 942; Becker v. Stineman, 115 Cal. App. 740, 2 P.(2d) 444; Domenigoni v. Imperial, etc., Mortgage Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36; Gridley v. Tilson, 202 Cal. 748, 262 P. 322; Barton v. El Canto Apartments (Cal. Sup.) 14 P.(2d) 501). Moreover, the doctrines of estoppel by conduct and ratification have no application to a contract which violates an express mandate of the law (Pollak v. Staunton, 210 Cal. 656, 293 P. 26).

Nor do the facts bring the case within the exception noted in such cases as Michell v. Grass Valley Gold Mines Co., 206 Cal. 609, 275 P. 418. The creditor in actions of this character affirms the contract of the corporation, and cannot recover if by reason of a defense good against the corporation the latter could not recover thereon. Spencer v. Anderson, 193 Cal. 1, 222 P. 355, 35 A. L. R. 822.

In Commercial Building Co. v. Levy, supra, the court pointed out the opportunities for fraud if corporations were allowed to depart from the terms of permits directing sales to be made for cash. As the court said: "The policy of the enactment is to protect buyers from possibility of injury, as far as the law will permit. Irrespective of the integrity of the organizers or directors of a corporation, the law must be obeyed. If under a permit to sell for cash only some of the stock should be sold for cash and some on deferred payments, irrespective of the contract, those who purchased for cash might find the assets of the corporation tied up in some project, wherein the directors had invested in reliance upon the unfulfilled promises with the result that further headway was impossible and the funds invested lost."

We are satisfied that the conclusions of the trial court from the facts are correct, and that nothing has been shown which would warrant a reversal of the judgment.

BALLARD v. SACRAMENTO NORTHERN RY. CO.*

Civ. 4611.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Sept. 28, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 28, 1932.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Master and servant ⇐111(1).

To comply with Federal Safety Appliance Act and rules promulgated thereunder, it was necessary that hand brake of gondola car could be operated with safety, not merely that brake operated efficiently (Federal Safety Appliance Act 1910, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]).

2. Master and servant ⇐278(6).

Evidence sustained finding that death of brakeman was caused by slipping of brake club while tightening hand brake on gondola car due to defective condition of brake, not dizziness or other physical infirmity (Federal Safety Appliance Act 1910, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]).

3. Death ⇐58(1).

Presumption is that deceased exercised due care for own safety.

4. Commerce ⇐27(3).

To authorize action for death under Federal Safety Appliance Act, it is sufficient if employer carries over its railway interstate traffic (Federal Safety Appliance Act 1910, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]).

It is not necessary that employee or employer at time of injury be actually engaged in interstate commerce.

5. Master and servant ⇐276(1).

Right to recover for death of brakeman resulting from defective hand brake of gondola car held governed by Federal Safety Appliance Act, not Workmen's Compensation Act (Federal Safety Appliance Acts, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]; St. 1917, p. 877, § 69 (c).

The action was controlled by the Federal Safety Appliance Act 1910 (45 USCA § 1 et seq.), not by Workmen's Compensation Act, because evidence showed that interstate commerce was carried on over lines of defendant railroad.

*Rehearing denied 15 P.(2d) 793.

6. Master and servant ⇐111(1).

It is railroad's absolute duty to maintain braking appliances in condition to be safely operated (Federal Safety Appliance Act 1910, § 2 [45 USCA § 11]).

7. Master and servant ⇐111(1).

Violation of Federal Safety Appliance Act constitutes negligence (Federal Safety Appliance Acts [45 USCA § 1 et seq.]).

8. Master and servant ⇐204(2), 228(2).

In actions based on violation of Federal Safety Appliance Act, contributory negligence, assumption of risk, and concurrent negligence are no defenses (Federal Employers' Liability Act §§ 3, 4 [45 USCA §§ 53, 54]).

9. Appeal and error ⇐1066.

Instructions that contributory negligence or assumption of risk were no defenses in action under Federal Safety Appliance Act, even if erroneous, were harmless (Federal Employers' Liability Act §§ 3, 4 [45 USCA §§ 53, 54]).

The giving of such instructions, even if erroneous, was harmless because there was not a scintilla of evidence indicating contributory negligence or showing that deceased brakeman committed a single negligent act, and because contributory negligence, where it applies, requires proof by party relying thereon unless plaintiff's testimony tenders such issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Mamie M. Ballard, administratrix of the estate of Charles K. Ballard, deceased, against the Sacramento Northern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

J. Hampton Hoge, of San Francisco, Hinsdale, Otis & Johnson, of Sacramento, R. W. Jennings, of San Francisco, and Loyd E. Hewitt, of Yuba City, for appellant.

Thomas F. McCue, of San Francisco, and Rich, Weis, Coats & Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff had judgment based upon the second cause of action set out in her complaint, from which judgment the defendant appeals. The second cause of action in the complaint sets forth, after reciting preliminary matters showing the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action, that Charles K. Ballard was, on and prior to the 11th day of November, 1930, a brakeman regularly employed by the defendant. That on the 11th day of November, 1930, at Marysville, Yuba county, said Charles K. Ballard came to his death by being thrown from the top of a freight car then and there being operated by the defendant. That the direct and proximate result of the death of Charles K. Ballard was the hauling, and permitting to be hauled and used on its railway line, a certain freight car known as a "gondola car," that was not equipped with efficient hand brakes; that the hand brake on said car had a defective and crooked brake shaft; that by reason of the defect in the brake shaft the brake on said car could not be set with safety; that when the wheel at the top of the brake shaft was turned, the crook in the shaft would cause the wheel to flare up on one side and down on the other, thereby causing the deceased to lose his balance and to fall from the top of the car to, and beneath the wheels thereof, which instantly caused his death; that the defendant was operating said car with a defective and inefficient brake that could not be set with safety, contrary to the terms and provisions of the Federal Safety Appliance Act. The section of the Federal Safety Appliance Act (45 USCA § 11) and the rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission promulgated in pursuance thereof, required that the rim or perimeter of the brake wheel on the top of the brake shaft should, on gondola cars, have a clearance of at least four inches above the top of the car. The evidence in this case showed a violation of this rule, and that there was not such clearance.

The photographic exhibits in this case show that in order to set the brake on a gondola car, the brakeman must take a position upon a narrow footboard on the end of the car, placing his foot against the "dog" or "pawl," give the brake wheel a turn with his hands, and with one of his feet push the "dog" or "pawl" into the ratchet which holds the brake as set. The footboard upon which the brakeman is required to stand is about midway between the top of the car and the bottom of the sill of the framework upon which the car is built. The photograph shows that this footboard is very narrow, and only of sufficient length to afford standing room for the brakeman operating the brake. Whenever it is desired to set the brake more securely than can be done by simply using the wheel at the top of the brake shaft, a club is inserted in the wheel, placing one end against the shaft as a fulcrum, and pressing the club against a spoke of the wheel. The length of the club reaching out beyond the circumference of the wheel gives the brakeman added power in setting the brake.

It appears from the testimony that this manner of setting brakes is required whenever the car is stopped upon a grade or incline, such that the brake cannot be efficiently operated from the power afforded by the simple use of the wheel.

The record shows that at the time of the accident the appellant was, and had prior thereto maintained, a railway of interstate commerce, or a railway over which interstate commerce was carried. As heretofore stated the deceased was employed in the capacity of a brakeman. On the day in question the crew of which the deceased was a member was engaged in backing a string of cars propelled by an electric motor, for the purpose of setting out two cars at a place known as the "Sandpit" in Marysville. At the place where the cars were to be spotted the grade or incline of the track was such that in order to set the brakes sufficiently tight for them to remain stationary upon the grade, it was necessary for the deceased to use a brake club. The gondola car to which we have referred was one of the cars so spotted and the car upon which the deceased was engaged in setting the brakes at the time he met with his death. This car was known as No. 4467, and was being spotted for the purpose of being loaded with sand.

The testimony is conflicting as to the flare of the brake wheel; that is, as to the difference between a horizontal plane and the plane described by the wheel in its revolutions. Some of the witnesses testified that there was a variation of two inches. One witness, who apparently made a minute examination of the wheel and the brake shaft, testified that there was a difference of six inches between the higher and the lower side of the wheel as it was turned upon the bent shaft.

It is admitted in the record that the brake wheel did not have the clearance prescribed by the rules promulgated by the Interstate Commerce Commission governing braking appliances on gondola cars. This negligence on the part of the defendant, while not controverted upon this appeal, is held by the appellant not to have been the efficient cause of the accident.

On the part of the respondent it is contended that the braking appliance which we have described was not only violative of the Federal Safety Appliance Act, but that it could not be efficiently operated safely. The question of whether the braking appliance could or could not be operated efficiently can only be resolved by taking into consideration the conditions surrounding the location of the car at the time when it became necessary to operate the appliance; that is, whether the condition of the braking appliance was such that it could be safely operated by the use of what is called a "brakeman's club," in order to set the brakes sufficiently tight to hold the car in place while being loaded. The respondent contends that the flare of the wheel giving, as one witness said, a drop of six inches in its revolutions, could not be safely operated when a brakeman was using a club, as the flare in the wheel or the variation from a horizontal plane in its revolutions was such as to create the hazard of the club slipping on the brake shaft and endangering the person of the brakeman. The photograph to which we have referred shows that the operator of the brake had a very narrow footboard upon which to stand, and that any defect which would cause the brake club to have a tendency to slip, might very readily imperil the person of the operator. True, if the operator of the brake had a very tight hold of the wheel with his right hand, while he was pushing the brake club with his left (this being the manner of operation), it might be possible, even though the brake club slipped and the operator's balance on the footboard was disturbed, he might save himself by holding to the brake wheel with his right hand. Contrarywise, if the full force and strength of his body were used in pressure upon the brake club in order to securely set the brakes, under the conditions presented it is reasonable to infer that any slight defect in the mechanism or a defect such as we have described might reasonably and probably would result in injury to the operator.

It may here be said that the photograph of the car in question, although very small, being about 2½x4½ inches, clearly shows the slant of the brake wheel at the top of the shaft.

[1] It is not simply a question of whether the brake in this case was efficient. In order to comply with the Safety Appliance Act and the rules promulgated in pursuance thereof, it was necessary that it could be operated with safety. The deceased in this instance had succeeded in setting the brake so as to hold the car in place. The question before the jury was really whether the appliance was such that the brakes could be safely set in the ordinary routine of a brakeman's duty, and as we have seen, in the ordinary routine of a brakeman's duty, whenever the cars were to be held upon a grade or an incline in the track, it was a part of the brakeman's duty, and the custom of brakemen to use the auxiliary means of a brakeman's club in order to exercise greater power in setting the brakes. This would necessitate a wheel equipment on the top of the brake shaft revolving upon a plane so limited in its variations as not to create the hazard of a slipping club. It requires no great mechanical knowledge to appreciate the extent to which this hazard would be created by a wheel which rose and fell a few inches in its revolutions. The jury had a right to take all these conditions and circumstances, and the up and down variation of the force that the brakeman exerted upon the club that would be caused by its rise and fall in the revolution of the brake wheel, into consideration.

[2] The testimony of the one witness to the accident may be summarized as follows: An ordinary man could not set the brake with his hands, enough to hold the car on the grade. It is the regular practice and necessary to use a brake club so that the brake will hold on a grade. The deceased was applying the brake on the gondola car; he was standing on the footboard at the end of the car. "I saw him make two efforts to set the brake; I saw him place the brake-club, taking hold of it and apparently using his strength in setting the brake; I saw him tip back and fall out of sight between the cars; his hands went up at the time, and the brake-club went out of his left hand; the deceased fell on the north side of the track and the wheels of the gondola car ran over his body killing him instantly."

As against this testimony and the circumstances which we have set forth herein, it is contended by the appellant that if the brake club slipped or was caused to slip, the deceased would have fallen forward, and therefore the defendant must have met his death from some other cause, dizziness being suggested, based upon the circumstance that a witness testified that a number of years previously the deceased had a dizzy spell. We see no compelling force in this contention. It is a matter of common knowledge, as every one who has ever set a brake on a freight car or observed a brakeman operating the same knows, that the operator places his feet near the ratchet on the brake shaft into which the "pawl" is forced to retain the pressure of the brake as it is being set, takes hold of the wheel with his hands, and in order to exert his full strength, throws the major portion of his body away from the wheel and brake shaft, describing an arc, so that if a perpendicular line were drawn from the instep of his feet to the top of his head, practically all of the body of the operator, in fact all except the arms and hands, would be from instead of toward the brake wheel side of that perpendicular line. This is in order to exercise the operator's full strength, aided by the weight of his body, in setting the brake. In doing this the swing of the body would describe an arc parallel with the top of the car.

The jury had before it a photograph of the car, and could easily visualize what we have just stated, and hence could not escape the conclusion that the law of gravity would carry the body downward with a slight side motion, just as occurred in this case, so that the body would be thrown prone across the tracks. We think the jury had a right to infer that the brake club slipped, for the reasons which we have stated, and that the added weight of the body of deceased (the testimony showing his weight to have been between 185 and 190 pounds) caused the grasp of his right hand upon the brake wheel to be loosened, and that the fall did not result from any attack of dizziness or physical infirmity on the part of the deceased.

Supporting its theory that the facts disclosed are insufficient to support the judgment, appellant cites the cases of Collins v. Great Northern Ry. Co., 181 Minn. 125, 231 N. W. 797, 798, Nealis v. Chicago, R. I. & P. Ry. Co., 173 Minn. 587, 218 N. W. 125, and Bruckman v. Chicago, St. P., M. & O. Ry. Co., 110 Minn. 308, 125 N. W. 263. The difference in the facts of these cases we think readily distinguishes them, and shows their inapplicability to the circumstances disclosed by the record presented for our review.

In the Collins Case the plaintiff testified that he was riding on the front end of the car traveling east; that he had the brake club in the wheel, and had tightened it up as much as he could; that he had his right foot against the top of the grabiron; that he put his weight, all he could, against the club, and the car began to slow down; that the car slowed down so that it was going about eight or ten miles an hour when it came in contact with other cars to which it was to be coupled; that normally it should have been going about two or four miles per hour; that he did not reduce the speed more because the brakes would not work; that the brake wheel just gave or went around suddenly; and that he went down with it; he could not say just how he went down. The record in the Collins Case shows neither defect nor inefficiency in the brake mechanism. The opinion of the court contains the following: "After the accident the brakes were found tightly set. They then worked properly. Plaintiff has no substantive proof to the contrary. The claim that the brakes were inefficient must be proved. It cannot rest on theory alone. The record leaves the cause of the accident uncertain. The most favorable view for plaintiff is that it rests in conjecture as to whether it was inefficient brakes, the fault of plaintiff, an unaccountable or unavoidable accident. The brake club may have slipped. The cause of the accident must be proved. Unless the cause is shown affirmatively, there can be no recovery."

It will be observed that while the court says that the brake club may have slipped, it does not set forth any facts or circumstances such as we find existing in the case at bar, from which the jury might very reasonably infer that the brake club was caused to slip. There is nothing in the Collins Case showing that the brake wheel had other than a revolution upon an invariable plane. There is nothing in the Collins Case showing failure on the part of the defendant to comply strictly with the Federal Safety Appliance Act, and from which failure or defect in the appliance, an inference might be drawn that the accident resulted therefrom.

The record in the case of Nealis v. Chicago, etc., supra, shows that the deceased was seen near the defective brake wheel. After the accident it was found that the brake was partly wound up. The brake staff was bent about two inches above the sill, and was thereby thrown an inch or two out of line; bent perhaps 10 or 15 degrees, and wobbled a little. It was claimed by the plaintiff in that case that the chain would pile up and slip off the shaft, having a tendency to throw the operator off his balance. The court in its opinion spoke as follows: "We will assume that the brake was defective, and that its defective condition was negligence. Plaintiff's case rests upon circumstantial evidence to establish a causal connection between such negligence and the accident. Such proof is not established when the evidence is merely consistent with the plaintiff's theory of how the accident occurred. The rule is that circumstantial evidence in such a case must furnish a reasonable basis for the inference by the jury of the ultimate fact that the negligence was the cause of the accident. The burden is upon the plaintiff to show that the causal connection is fairly and reasonably inferable from the facts and circumstances actually disclosed by the evidence. Such evidence must justify an inference that the accident resulted from such negligence rather than from some other cause." (Citing a number of cases). Here again the record fails to disclose that the deceased was actually operating the brake, and that the mechanism was defective or in anywise calculated to imperil the person of the operator. In the instant case the defective appliance and the deceased are found to have been working together, and the inference is fairly logical that the result was brought about just as we have heretofore stated.

In the Bruckman Case, supra, the evidence shows that the deceased was seen approaching a gondola car and reached for the ladder, and the lantern which the deceased was holding was carried up the ladder to the top of the car, and shortly afterward was seen to fall to the ground. The brake appliance on the gondola car was found to be defective. After the accident the brake was partly set. After the gondola car and others had passed by the witnesses, the deceased was found lying across an adjoining track, face downward, over which a passenger train had passed. The body had been dragged some 60 or 70 feet. The court held that there was no causal connection shown to exist between the defective brake appliances and the death of the brakeman.

Not having been seen upon the defective footboard necessary to be occupied in operating the brake, it could not be said that such defect had anything to do with the accident. The connecting links were found to be absent in the Bruckman Case, but we may add that the language of the court shows it to have been a border-line case and not of sufficient convincing power to be controlling here.

[3] We think the facts of the instant case as we have reviewed them, especially when taken in connection with the law of this state, that the deceased was presumed to have exercised due care for his own safety, sufficiently disclosed the causal connection between the defective appliance and the death of the deceased, and that the judgment should be affirmed, unless the trial court had no jurisdiction, or other errors are shown by the record.

In this particular it is urged that the trial court had no jurisdiction, and also that prejudicial error was committed by giving an instruction on the subject of contributory negligence. Section 56 of title 45, USCA, page 515, so far as applicable here, reads as follows: "The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this chapter shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States, and no case arising under this chapter and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States."

[4] Referring to section 11, 45 USCA, page 59, being a portion of the acts involved herein, the rule appears to be well settled that it is not necessary that either the employee or the company, at the time of the injury, be actually engaged in interstate commerce. All that is necessary is that the carrier conducts and carries over its railway, interstate traffic. Stearns v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 166 Iowa, 566, 148 N. W. 128; Texas & P. Ry. Co. v. Rigsby, 241 U. S. 33, 36 S. Ct. 482, 60 L. Ed. 874, 875; St. Louis S. W. Ry. Co. of Texas v. Smith (C. C. A.) 254 F. 581; Texas & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Sprole (Tex. Civ. App.) 202 S. W. 985. Other cases might be cited, but the foregoing appear to be sufficient.

[5, 6] The contention that the Workmen's Compensation Act applies we think is without merit. In Smithson, etc., v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 148, 162 P. 111, in speaking of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, which corresponds in force and effect with the Safety Appliance Act, the Supreme Court said, quoting from the syllabus: "In actions brought in the state courts under the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act, approved April 22, 1908, the decisions of the supreme court of the United States are controlling in the construction of the act." Here, jurisdiction to try cases based upon the Federal Safety Appliance Act is vested in district and superior courts. By subdivision (c) of section 69 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 877), it is expressly provided that where interstate commerce questions are presented, resort to the courts is not prohibited. We do not need to review the testimony showing that interstate commerce is carried on over the lines of the defendant, further than to state it is sufficient to establish such character, and the record shows that the defendant practically admitted such character in the trial court. Under the Safety Appliance Act, it is the absolute duty of the carrier to maintain the several parts of the braking appliances in such condition that they may be safely operated. Armitage v. Chicago, M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 54 Mont. 38, 166 P. 301; LaMere v. Railway Transfer Co. of City of Minneapolis, 125 Minn. 159, 145 N. W. 1068, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 667.

In the case of Lockhart v. S. P. Co., 91 Cal. App. 770, 267 P. 591, the Safety Appliance Act was not involved. The cause was prosecuted under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and it was not shown that the car upon which the injured workman was engaged was, or ever had been, employed in interstate commerce. The same may be said of the case of Johnson v. S. P. Co., 199 Cal. 126, 248 P. 501, 49 A. L. R. 1323.

[7] We do not need to cite the long list of authorities holding that violation of the Safety Appliance Act constitutes negligence. One case only needs to be referred to. Spokane & Inland Empire Ry. Co. v. Campbell, 241 U. S. at page 509, 36 S. Ct. 683, 60 L. Ed. 1125.

[8, 9] At the request of the plaintiff the court instructed the jury that contributory negligence or assumption of risk could not avail the defendant in actions based upon violation of the Safety Appliance Act. This the appellant urges as prejudicial error. Irrespective of the law on this subject, which we believe to be adverse to the appellant's contention, the instruction of the court must be held harmless. There is not a scintilla of evidence set forth in the record indicating contributory negligence, or showing that the deceased committed a single negligent act. Contributory negligence, where it applies, is a matter requiring proof by the party relying thereon, unless the testimony of the plaintiff tenders that issue. The only evidence submitted on the part of the appellant was concerning the condition of the braking appliance. No attempt was made to show any facts indicating negligence on the part of the deceased.

Our attention is called to the case of Minneapolis, etc., Ry. Co. v. Popplar, 237 U. S. 369, 35 S. Ct. 609, 59 L. Ed. 1000, where a reference is made in the opinion to the former case of Schlemmer v. Buffalo, etc., Ry. Co., 220 U. S. 590, 598, 31 S. Ct. 561, 55 L. Ed. 596, where it is said the defense of contributory negligence was not dealt with by the statute, and that the federal statute touched the duty of the master at a single point and, save as provided in the statute, the right of the plaintiff to recover was left to be determined by the law of the state. Later decisions, however, hold applicable section 53 of title 45 (see 45 USCA, p. 379), which reads in part as follows: "Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee." Again, section 54, supra, holds that where there is a violation of any statute enacted for the safety of employees, assumption of risk is not a defense.

In Spokane v. Campbell, supra, the Supreme Court of the United States distinctly holds that under the Safety Appliance Act, recovery may be had even when there is a concurrence of a violation of the act and negligence of the employee. This case refers to the case of San Antonio & A. P. Ry. Co. v. Wagner, 241 U. S. 476, 36 S. Ct. 626, 60 L. Ed. 1110, where it is held that a violation of the Safety Appliance Act is negligence in itself.

In Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Huxoll, 245 U. S. 535, 38 S. Ct. 187, 62 L. Ed. 455, it was held that the concurrent negligence of the deceased did not prevent recovery based upon the violation of the Safety Appliance Act.

In LaMere v. Railway Transfer Co., etc., supra, it was held that the defense of contributory negligence did not bar recovery, based upon the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 USCA §§ 51–59) and Federal Safety Appliance Acts (45 USCA § 1 et seq.).

In Southern Pacific Co. v. Thomas, 21 Ariz. 355, 188 P. 268, the Supreme Court of Arizona held (quoting from the syllabus): "Where the carrier failed to have proper couplers on cars, as required by the Federal Safety Appliance Acts (45 USCA § 1 et seq.), the brakeman's contributory negligence in going between parting cars without giving the proper signal is no defense."

In Thayer v. Denver & R. G. R. Co., 25 N. M. 559, 185 P. 542, 544, we find the following: "The action being based upon a claimed violation of the Safety Appliance Act, the defense of assumption of risk and contributory negligence are eliminated." (Citing sections of the act and the cases to which we have heretofore referred.)

The judgment is affirmed.

TONNER v. SPEARS-WELLS MACHINERY CO., Inc., et al.

Civ. 8492.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California.

Oct. 13, 1932.

Trial ⇐296(13).

Alleged error in giving of instruction held cured by subsequent withdrawal thereof, although court did not tell jury that instruction was incorrect.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by Lawrence H. Tonner against the Spears-Wells Machinery Company, Inc., and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

Affirmed.

Kilpatrick & Goodman, of Oakland, for appellant.

Raymond Salisbury, of Oakland, for respondents.

SPENCE, J.

Plaintiff sought damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of defendants. The cause was tried by a jury, and, from a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

Plaintiff claimed to have sustained his injuries when the motorcycle upon which he was riding upon a city street, at a speed of about eight miles per hour, skidded on some oil which had drained out of a road oiler operated by defendants.

The only assignment of error is that the trial court erred in giving a certain instruction to the jury. It appears, however, that the trial court subsequently withdrew the instruction when the jury returned and requested further instructions on the subject of contributory negligence. The trial court then gave the jury further instructions thoroughly covering this subject, and continued as follows:

"In addition to that I gave an instruction which I myself had marked, and about which I was in doubt, and I am satisfied that I did not intend to read the instruction, but I did read it, and at this time I withdraw that instruction from the consideration of the jury, because I am rather inclined to think that that infringes upon the province of the jury, and that instruction was this:

"If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff was riding his motorcycle at such a rate of speed that he could have observed the oil upon the street and could have stopped his motorcycle before coming in contact with the oil, and that he failed to do so, then the plaintiff was negligent and he cannot recover.

"That instruction is withdrawn from the consideration of the jury, because I have become satisfied after considering it—I had a doubt, because I marked a question mark on it that in that instruction the Court was entrenching upon the province of the jury as to what really amounts as to a matter of fact, so I withdraw that instruction entirely from the consideration of the jury, and you are to consider these instructions as I have heretofore read, and they are the only instructions you are to consider on the question of contributory negligence. I think I have covered everything, but as I say I was in doubt, there was a doubt in my mind about that instruction that I read, and I am withdrawing that entirely from the consideration of the jury, that is the instruction that I have just read to you."

Assuming, without deciding, that the challenged instruction was erroneous, any error in the giving of said instruction was cured by its subsequent withdrawal from the consideration of the jury. Counsel for appellant concedes that error in the giving of an instruction may be so cured, but contends that "the instruction here complained of was not properly withdrawn." We find no merit in this contention. The trial court was at pains to tell the jury not only once but four times that said instruction was withdrawn from their consideration. In our opinion, it was entirely unnecessary for the trial court in withdrawing said instruction to tell the jury that the instruction as originally given was not a correct statement of the law.

ROHWER v. GIBSON (WILSON, Intervener).

Civ. 4764.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

1. Mandamus ⇐3(1).

Unpaid bondholders of reclamation district have no speedy or adequate remedy, so that their rights must be enforced and adjusted according to equitable principles (Pol. Code, § 3459; §§ 3456, 3480, as amended by St. 1931, pp. 754, 762, §§ 1, 6; § 3466a, as added by St. 1931, p. 773, § 7).

2. Drains ⇐18.

Each bondholder holding matured coupons is entitled to share, in proportion to his holdings, in fund realized from assessment levied on lands within reclamation district (Pol. Code, § 3459; §§ 3456, 3480, as amended by St. 1931, pp. 754, 762, §§ 1, 6; § 3466a, as added by St. 1931, p. 773, § 7).

3. Mandamus ⇐10.

Writ of mandate must be based on existing right, which can be neither enhanced nor lessened by application for writ.

4. Mandamus ⇐1.

Prerogative writ of mandamus should issue to prevent failure of justice, but not where injustice will result.

5. Mandamus ⇐110.

Where reclamation district funds are insufficient to pay all outstanding matured coupons attached to bonds, mandamus may issue to require substantial pro rata distribution where funds are sufficient for substantial payment (Pol. Code, § 3459; §§ 3456, 3480, as amended by St. 1931, pp. 754, 762, §§ 1, 6; § 3466a, as added by St. 1931, p. 773, § 7).

6. Mandamus ⇐176.

Where reclamation district funds are insufficient to pay all outstanding matured coupons attached to bonds, bondholder applying for mandamus is entitled to pro rata share in funds and no more (Pol. Code, § 3459; §§ 3456, 3480, as amended by St. 1931, pp. 754, 762, §§ 1, 6; § 3466a, as added by St. 1931, p. 773, § 7).

Application by C. Rohwer for writ of mandate to be directed to California Gibson, as Treasurer of Colusa County, wherein Delaplane Wilson intervened.

Writ directed to issue as to petitioner and intervener.

Harry B. Seymour and Clyde H. Brand, both of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Ralph W. Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondent.

Mr. Justice PLUMMER delivered the opinion of the court.

The petitioner in this action is the owner and holder of 1,395 of the outstanding bonds of reclamation district No. 2047, of the aggregate value of $1,395,000. All of said bonds are dated July 1, 1924, and are of the face value of $1,000 each, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. On July 1, 1932, there became due on each bond the sum of $30, as evidenced by the coupons attached thereto; that on the 1st day of July, 1932, there became due on the bonds held by your petitioner the sum of $41,850, being the amount of the interest coupons falling due on said date; that the respondent in this action is the county treasurer of Colusa county, and is the custodian of the bond fund of reclamation district 2047; that reclamation district 2047, hereinafter referred to as "Reclamation District," is a duly organized and existing reclamation district under the laws of the state of California existing in Colusa and Glenn counties, the greater portion thereof existing in the county of Colusa, which county is designated as the main county of said reclamation district; that on the 1st day of July, 1932, the predecessor in interest of the petitioner presented to said county treasurer of Colusa county, and custodian of the funds of said reclamation district, all of the coupons herein referred to, and demanded payment of the same by the said county treasurer; that the respondent, as treasurer of said Colusa county, and custodian of the funds of said reclamation district, thereupon refused, and still continues to refuse to pay the amount due on said coupons, or any proportion thereof; that thereupon, and after refusal of the respondent to pay said coupons, demand was made for the registration thereof, and said coupons were registered by the respondent by listing the same in a book kept by her designated as "Registration Ledger of Reclamation District No. 2047," and indorsing the fact and date of registration on the back of said coupons; that on the 1st day of July, 1932, there was in the bond fund of said reclamation district the sum of $50,742.12 applicable to the payment of interest coupons on the bonds of said reclamation district falling due on said date.

The petition then sets forth that there was due on the 1st day of July, 1932, on coupons outstanding, the sum of $54,840. The record shows, however, that these figures are inaccurate, and that there was in fact an outstanding indebtedness on coupons falling due on the 1st day of July, 1932, in the sum of $65,340. The petition concludes with a prayer that a writ be issued by this court directing and commanding the respondent, as custodian of the funds of said reclamation district, to pay to the plaintiff, in cancellation of the coupons referred to, the sum of $41,850, or to show cause why such payment should not be made.

The petition of the intervener, Delaplane Wilson, sets forth that he is the owner and holder of five certain bonds of said reclamation district of the value of $5,000; that said bonds were registered on the 1st day of June, 1928; that interest became due on said bonds on the 1st day of July, 1932, in the sum of $150; that demand has been made upon the respondent as custodian of the funds of said reclamation district, for payment, but that no such payment has been made; and that said payment has been refused. The prayer of the intervener is that the respondent be required to pay the interest due on said registered bonds and that priority be given in the making of such payment.

The answer of the respondent sets forth that following the 1st day of July, 1932, and the 8th day of August, 1932, there had been presented to the respondent for payment additional coupons on bonds of said reclamation district, maturing on July 1, 1932, the sum of $20,130, and that demand had been made upon the respondent for payment of the same; that the amount of money on hand in the bond fund of said reclamation district, available for the payment of said coupons of said bonds maturing July 1, 1932, is and was insufficient to pay the coupons so presented, and for which payment was demanded; that the deficiency in the amount of money in the hands of the respondent to pay the total of the interest coupons maturing July 1, 1932, arose by reason of the fact that the installment of the assessment theretofore levied on the several tracts of land in the reclamation district from which said bonds and interest are to be paid, and of which an installment thereof in an amount sufficient to pay said coupons maturing July 1, 1932, plus 15 per cent. allowed for estimated delinquencies, though regularly called, had not been paid on all of the lands lying within said reclamation district; that the tracts of land upon which said call for the payment of an installment of said assessment had become delinquent, had been regularly sold in the manner provided by law, and in large part had been bought in by said respondent as trustee of said reclamation district, and that when redeemed, if they are redeemed or otherwise disposed of, sufficient money will be available to pay all of the coupons maturing July 1, 1932.

It is further shown that, if the installments now delinquent on certain tracts of land are paid, or the lands redeemed from delinquent sales, additional sums will come to the hands of the respondent applicable to the payment of said coupons. The record does not show to what extent the delinquencies will affect the ability of the district to pay and discharge all of the coupons maturing on July 1, 1932; nor is there anything of record showing whether any moneys will actually be received by the payment of delinquent taxes, or the sale of the lands upon which delinquent taxes have become due; nor is any time fixed within which such moneys will be or can be received. In other words, the record leaves us wholly uncertain to what extent the insufficiency of the funds will affect the ability of the district to discharge its obligations. The only certainty shown by the record in relation to the funds of the reclamation district is that the total of the coupons falling due July 1, 1932, and presented for payment, exceeded the money in the hands of the respondent as custodian of the funds of the reclamation district in the sum of about $15,000, against which demands have been made for payment of coupons of the value of $61,980.

Upon the facts thus presented, What are the rights of the petitioner and intervener? Are they entitled to an order of this court directing full payment of the coupons presented by them, by reason of the fact that they have followed up their demand by this proceeding seeking to compel such payment? Or should the court, recognizing that the money should not be held by the treasurer for an indefinite time, direct payment to the petitioner and intervener of a proportionate share of the moneys in the hands of the treasurer available for payment of matured coupons?

Before reviewing the cases cited by the respective counsel and making their application, the various sections of the Political Code relating to reclamation districts may profitably be compared with the sections of the California irrigation district laws, and their dissimilarity pointed out in order that the holding of the different cases may be correctly applied to our decision herein. This course is necessitated by reason of the fact that some of the cases cited are based upon reclamation laws and others upon irrigation district laws.

Section 52 of the California irrigation district laws specially provides that matured bonds and interest coupons shall be paid upon presentation. This section was amended after the decision of the Colorado Supreme Court based upon irrigation district laws reading the same as section 52, supra, prior to its amendment. The portion of the section referred to reads as follows: "Upon presentation of any matured bond or any matured interest coupon of any bond of the district, the treasurer shall pay the same from the bond fund." St. 1897, p. 272, § 52, as amended by St. 1919, p. 667, § 11. The section was amended as to time of payment in 1931 (Stats. 1931, p. 172, § 1). Section 52, supra, also provides that unpaid coupons may be registered and shall bear interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of presentation for payment until notice is given that funds are available for making such payment. Section 39 of the California irrigation district laws (as amended by St. 1931, p. 122) provides for the levy and collection of taxes every year. This levy of taxes is not made or based upon any benefits theretofore determined as being received by any of the lands within the district. The taxes are levied practically in the same manner as county or municipal taxes, to wit, the value of the land is taken into consideration in making the assessment, and then the taxes levied upon the value of the land in the district sufficient to meet the bond and coupon interest fund, or as it is now called in the act, "the bond fund." The irrigation district laws also provide for enforcing the collection of the taxes in the manner similar to that of collecting county or municipal taxes.

It is further provided in the California irrigation district laws that unpaid registered interest coupons shall be paid in the order of their registration; thus, if at any semiannual period coupons are presented after the funds have been exhausted by payment of coupons previously presented, the holder of the coupons registered under such circumstances is entitled to priority of payment whenever funds are available therefor. The taxing power conferred by the California irrigation laws continues so long as the district is in existence, and by reason of the fact that unpaid coupons may be registered and thereafter draw interest at an advanced rate, compensation is made to the holder of such coupons for any disadvantage suffered by reason of deferred payments. The reclamation district laws are silent as to many of these provisions. The paragraph of section 3480 of the Political Code, as amended by St. 1931, p. 762, § 6, establishing a bond fund reads as follows: "All moneys collected by any county treasurer upon any assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued, including all moneys derived from sale of land for delinquent installments, or from redemption thereof, or from sale of lands bought by the treasurer at any such sale, shall be by such treasurer forthwith paid into the main county treasury and except as otherwise provided in section 3466a of this code, shall be credited to the bond fund of such reclamation district and used exclusively for the payment of principal and interest of said bonds issued on such assessment, and of the principal and interest of any refunding bonds issued thereon." Section 3466a, supra (as added by St. 1931, p. 773, § 7), relates to procedure of the sale of lands for delinquent taxes, and need not be further considered herein. Section 3456 of the Political Code (as amended by St. 1931, p. 754, § 1) contains the procedure to be followed in making assessments of the lands lying within reclamation districts.

After the plans for the reclamation district had been approved and the cost thereof ascertained or estimated, commissioners are appointed to view the lands within the district, and to make an assessment thereon according to the benefits that will accrue to each particular tract by reason of the reclamation. After this is done, the amount of the assessment is called at different times and in different installments, as may be necessary to meet the expenses and pay the bonded indebtedness and the interest on the bonds.

Section 3459 of the Political Code authorizes the levying of a supplemental assessment in the event that the original assessment is insufficient to provide for the complete reclamation of the lands of the district, or if further assessments are from time to time required to provide for the protection, maintenance and repair of the reclamation works.

Section 3456, supra, also provides that in the levying of taxes there shall be included in incidental expenses an amount necessary for the payment of interest on any refunding bonds that may be issued by the district.

Section 3480, supra, also provides that the lien of any unpaid assessment upon which bonds shall have been issued shall continue until all said bonds and any refunding bonds that may be issued shall have been paid in full, and, in the event that any bonds are unpaid, a supplemental assessment may be made upon the lands within the district, according to the provisions of section 3459, sufficient to pay the unpaid principal and interest. The supplemental assessment is authorized to be enforced in the same manner as the original assessment.

It will be noted that in the California irrigation district laws there is no limit to the levying of taxes similar to the provisions found in the reclamation district laws. One is a straight levying of taxes from year to year upon the assessed valuation of the property; in the other there is first an assessment placed upon the lands according to the estimated value of the benefits to accrue thereon. When the collection of taxes has reached the value of the benefits conferred upon the lands within the district, there is then no legal provision for placing any additional burdens. In other words, if under such conditions the bonded indebtedness has not all been paid, there exists no legal provision by means of which the holders thereof may receive payment. Reassessments or supplemental assessments can only be made upon the lands of a reclamation district so that the amount thereof will not exceed the benefits accruing to the lands assessed. Kadow v. Paul, 274 U. S. 175, 47 S. Ct. 561, 71 L. Ed. 982. Nor can any reassessment be made until all the installments covering the original assessment have been called and proceedings taken looking to the collection of delinquent taxes and sales of lands for delinquent taxes fully completed. This is true for the simple reason that it cannot be ascertained what amount is necessary to cover the outstanding indebtedness of the district, reassessment being possible only when the original assessment undervalues the benefits received by the different parcels of land from the reclamation works carried out by the district.

We do not need to consider the provisions of the Political Code relating to refunding bonds, nor to the sections relating to the calling of installments of taxes, further than to say that the assessment mentioned in the section refers to the estimated value of the improvements to the respective tracts of land placed thereon by the commissioners appointed to view the lands of the district, and that the several installments relate to the amount of money called for when the estimate is made as to the sum needed to pay the maturing bonds and maturing interest coupons thereon. The assessment to which we have referred underlies the bond issue, and, if the assessment is equal to the benefits accruing to the lands, there is nothing left to support the bond issue to the extent, if and when such bond issue exceeds in value the amount of the assessment.

The provisions of the Political Code relating to the collection of money for the payment of bonds and interest coupons refer only to the collection of installments. The installments are not separate assessments. There is only one assessment, although there may be a number of installments; that is, the payment of the one assessment may be called for at different times and in different amounts until the whole of the assessment has been called for. As we read the Political Code it contemplates that there shall be but one assessment supporting a bond issue; that the assessment shall be sufficient therefor; and that supplemental or additional assessments can only be made, as we have stated, when such supplemental or additional assessments will not exceed the value of the benefits accruing or conferred.

A reading of the different Political Code provisions prescribing the procedure to be followed in enforcing the payment of any particular installment shows very clearly that a long time must necessarily intervene between the calling of the installment and the realization, if ever, of the collection of any delinquent taxes.

Section 3466a, supra, after providing for the sale of lands upon which taxes had become delinquent, empowers the trustees of the district, when the land has been sold to the treasurer as trustee, to manage and control the land, lease it out to tenants upon such reasonable rental as may be determined upon, and the revenues derived therefrom credited to the particular delinquent tract.

[1] From this résumé of the Political Code it is evident that the holders of unpaid bonds have no speedy or adequate remedy; that the process of levying supplemental or additional assessments is not only long and tedious, but involves court proceedings and uncertainties which readily distinguish the right of such bondholders from the holders of bonds issued under and in pursuance of the irrigation laws of the state. These contingencies and differences we think differentiate the one from the other so that equitable principles which might not apply to one may be readily invoked and applied in the other in order that bondholders may have equal treatment and no one given special advantages.

The differences in the laws relating to irrigation districts and reclamation districts in other states from the Code provisions of California must be kept in mind in considering the cases having to do with bonds of different districts. In the case of State ex rel. Bliss et al. v. Grand River Drainage District of Livingston and Linn Counties, 49 S.W.(2d) 121, 125, the Supreme Court of Missouri, in an action in mandamus, brought for the purpose of compelling payment of interest coupons, we find the following: "This statute [referring to the act of 1929] clearly contemplates that the taxing power with which a drainage district is vested shall be so exercised as to make provision for the payment in full of all bonds which it authorizes. It does not appear from the record here that the power with which respondent drainage district is armed to assess, levy, and collect taxes for the purpose of paying its bonds and the interest thereon has been exhausted, nor that the future exercise of that power will not be fruitful in obtaining the necessary funds. On the contrary, it is admitted 'that the proper officers of said district and of said Livingston and Linn Counties are now engaged in collecting said taxes levied and assessed as aforesaid.' In these circumstances the equitable doctrine of equality as applied in the apportionment among creditors of the funds and assets of an insolvent debtor is without application. It is also within the contemplation of the statute * * * as shown by various and sundry of its provisions, that taxes levied by a drainage district may become delinquent and that because of such delinquency bonds issued by it may not be paid at their maturity. Yet, the statute is wholly silent as to preferences or priorities as between the holders of matured bonds, when the funds at a given time are not sufficient to pay all. Nor does it contain a requirement, or even an intimation, that none of such bondholders shall be paid until funds are available to pay all. On the contrary, by the clearest implications it places upon the board of supervisors the imperative duty to pay matured and maturing bonds and interest installments as long and as often as funds are available for that purpose."

The opinion in the Grand River Drainage District Case further states that, if the district were a private corporation with definite ascertainable assets, and those assets insufficient, when liquidated, to meet its obligations to creditors, principles of equitable adjustment could probably be invoked, but that the district was a municipal corporation with general assets, etc., and that its indebtedness was payable solely from a special fund to be derived from taxation of lands lying within the boundaries of the district.

The circumstances of the Grand River Drainage District Case are not similar to those presented here. In the former case it is shown that the officers are proceeding with the collection of the taxes, and the court there was justified in assuming that a sufficient amount to pay all the maturing obligations would be realized. Here, it is shown that taxes have gone delinquent; that sales have been made and the realization of sufficient funds depends upon many contingencies, to wit, whether the lands will be redeemed; whether the lands can be sold to pay the taxes; and whether the lands that have been bought in by the treasurer as trustee of the district can be disposed of, or as we have seen, managed by the trustees of the district in such a way as to realize any revenues therefrom. In any event, realization of funds is dependent on postponed events which may never take place.

Again, section 10788 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri (Mo. St. Ann. § 10788), providing for the issue of bonds by reclamation districts, makes all the deferred interest coupons interest-bearing, that is to say, whenever an interest coupon is presented for payment, and funds are not sufficient to redeem the same, that coupon bears interest from the date of its presentation for payment until it is paid. The reading of the section is as follows: "All bonds and coupons not paid at maturity shall bear interest at the rate of six per centum per annum from maturity until paid, or until sufficient funds have been deposited at the place of payment and the said interest shall be appropriated by the board of supervisors out of the penalties and interest collected on delinquent taxes or any other available funds of the district." There is no similar provision in the Political Code of this state. Under the California reclamation laws interest coupons do not bear interest, and the holder thereof is not compensated for any delay caused by payment to a bondholder who has previously presented his interest coupons for payment and exhausted the fund available therefor.

The opinion of the court in the Grand River Drainage District Case, supra, does not indicate that the court had before it or considered any question as to the moneys collected on account of the special improvement assessment being a trust fund to which all bondholders must look for payment, and to payment out of which each bondholder was equally entitled. That money paid into the hands of a depositary on account of improvement assessments is a trust fund is supported by all the authorities, some of which we will hereafter cite.

[2, 3] If the holders of bonds issued by the district stood upon an equality immediately preceding the filing of a petition for a writ of mandate by one of them, we do not perceive how the rights of any of the bondholders can be changed by reason of any such action. In the instant case it appears that there is in the hands of the respondent, as the custodian of the moneys received on account of the assessment levied on the lands within reclamation district 2047, sufficient to pay approximately 75 per cent. of the matured interest coupons. Each bondholder holding matured coupons is entitled to his equal proportion of that sum, and to have payment made to him of that sum. Thus, if the petitioner in this case was entitled only to a payment of 75 per cent. of the amount of the interest accrued upon the coupons held by him, how can it be concluded that he is entitled, either equitably, legally, or logically, to enhance his payment 25 per cent. simply by filing a petition praying for a writ of mandate? As we understand the law, a writ of mandate must be based upon an existing right, and that existing right can neither be enhanced nor lessened by the filing of a petition praying for such writ. Hence, the right of the petitioner to only 75 per cent. of the payment upon his coupons out of the trust fund was and is the right upon which his petition is based. That the petitioner may be entitled to full payment or remedies that may exist against the district, is an entirely different proposition from demanding payment out of the trust fund in the hands of the custodian, other or greater than the equitable proportion to which he is entitled.

In the cases of Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 P. 884, and Meyer v. Widber, 126 Cal. 252, 58 P. 532, payment was allowed in full in mandamus proceedings, but an examination of those cases discloses that what we are here presenting was not considered. The opinions in those cases entirely overlooked the fact which exists in this case of the moneys collected upon a special assessment constituting a trust fund.

Some weight appears to have been given in the Widber Case to the fact that six months elapsed before any of the coupon holders had instituted an action; nor is there anything in either one of the cases indicating that there were any circumstances showing that full payment of the bonds would probably never be made. So far as those cases are concerned, the fund, to all intents and purposes, was spoken of as though it were inexhaustible, and in the Widber Case, that the coupon holders might otherwise have been compensated; all of which distinguishes the two California cases just cited from the circumstances with which we are dealing.

In Bates v. McHenry (Cal. App.) 10 P.(2d) 1038, relied upon by the petitioner, this court was dealing exclusively with the irrigation laws which we have pointed out as being essentially dissimilar in its provisions from the reclamation district laws. We there called attention to the particular wording of section 52 of the irrigation district laws, as amended in 1931 (Stats. 1931, p. 172, § 1), wherein the irrigation laws were amended providing that bonds and interest coupons should be paid upon presentation. Unpaid bonds and coupons could be registered, bear interest, and thereafter take priority in payment. Those questions are not involved here.

Again, the moneys raised to pay the indebtedness of an irrigation district depend upon an inexhaustible taxing power which may be continued from year to year until all outstanding obligations are discharged. Under the reclamation laws this is not the case. A special fund, fixed by a special assessment, depending in its amount upon benefits conferred, is created for the redemption of the bonded indebtedness of the district. The holder of a bond against an irrigation district receives compensation on account of deferred payments, and at the same time relies upon the inexhaustible taxing power of the district. The holder of a bond issued by a reclamation district has simply one fund raised, as we have stated, out of which he may expect payment, and the taxing power is limited and circumscribed, and cannot constitutionally go beyond the benefits conferred upon the land.

It follows from these considerations that, while if it were necessary to reaffirm everything said in the case of Bates v. McHenry, that case would not be controlling here by reason of the differing provisions of the acts of the Legislature involved in the respective cases.

[4] In the Bates Case, supra, this court called attention to the holding of the Colorado Supreme Court, Thomas v. Patterson, County Treasurer, etc., 61 Colo. 547, 159 P. 34, and the case of Norris et al. v. Montezuma Valley Irr. Dist. et al. (C. C. A.) 248 F. 369, in which cases the irrigation district law of the state of Colorado, being similar in its provisions relative to the payment of bonds and interest coupons, with the reclamation law of this state, it was held that as there was no priority between bondholders, one bondholder could not maintain mandamus proceedings to compel payment in full of his interest coupons to the exclusion of others who are equally entitled to payment. Those cases distinguished by this court in the case of Bates v. McHenry, supra, are authority for the holding here that priority should not be given to any coupon holder by reason of the fact that he is first in filing a petition for a writ of mandate; that his right was only to a proportionate share of the trust fund, a right which could not be enhanced, but might be enforced by mandamus proceedings. We may here state that mandamus is a prerogative writ and should never be used by the court to effectuate an injustice, but only to prevent a failure of justice (16 Cal. Jur. 764); and, while the writ may always be employed to enforce a right, we have not been able to discover any authority holding that the writ may be used to enhance a right.

The circumstances under which a writ of mandate will be issued requiring payment in full, are clearly stated in the opinion of the Supreme Court of Florida in the case of State ex rel. Gillespie et al. v. Carlton et al., 138 So. 612, 618, to wit: "To support relators' contentions in this respect, there appear to be many adjudicated cases which hold that the rule is that, when a fund has accrued in the hands of a debtor which is insufficient to pay all bonds payable out of such fund, one bondholder of the series for which the raising of such fund was pledged when the bonds were issued may have his bonds ordered paid in full from the funds in his debtor's hands, even though the fund at the time of bringing suit is not sufficient to pay all the outstanding bonds then matured, it appearing that the funds in hand are accruals from the exercise of an inexhaustible power of taxation, and that the whole fund required, of which the fund in hand is but a part, is replenishable by the further exercise of the inexhaustible taxing power, thereby enabling the debtor to ultimately pay all who may have claims against the fund as a whole. City of Galena v. U. S. ex rel. Amy, 5 Wall. 705, 18 L. Ed. 560; City of New Orleans v. U. S. ex rel. Stewart, 49 F. 40 (C. C. A., 5th Circuit); Meyer v. Porter, 65 Cal. 67, 2 P. 884; Ward v. Piper, 69 Kan. 773, 77 P. 699, 700; Voorhies v. Mayor, etc., of City of Houston, 70 Tex. 331, 7 S. W. 679; United States ex rel. Dana v. Village of Kent (C. C. N. D. Ohio) 107 F. 190; City of Austin v. Cahill, 99 Tex. 172, 88 S. W. 542, 89 S. W. 552; State ex rel. v. City of New Orleans, 37 La. Ann. 13 (cited with approval in City of New Orleans v. U. S. ex rel., supra); Select and Common Councils of City of Williamsport v. Commonwealth, 90 Pa. 498; Henrylyn Irr. Dist. v. Thomas, 66 Colo. 300, 181 P. 980; Hook v. German-American Bank, 152 App. Div. 253, 136 N. Y. S. 1019." The fund in that case was found to be not inexhaustible, and the writ applied for was denied.

In the recent case of Meyers et al. v. City of Idaho Falls et al., 11 P.(2d) 626, 628, the Supreme Court of Idaho, in considering the nature of the fund collected on account of special improvement assessments, held as follows: "Under the statute the municipality had the power to levy the entire cost of each improvement in one assessment. Its officers chose, however, to issue bonds for a ten-year period. The bonds succeed to the lien of the original assessment, and the assessments thereafter levied and collected is a 'trust fund pledged by law for the payment of the bonds.' Jewell v. City of Superior (C. C. A.) 135 F. 19. The only duty with which the city officials are charged is the levying of assessments and payment of the funds collected to the bondholders (Moore v. City of Nampa [C. C. A.] 18 F.(2d) 860), and there is no contention that the city has not fulfilled its obligation in this connection. The deficiencies which exist have arisen because the owners of certain parcels of property within each district failed to pay their assessments and general taxes, and the property reverted to the county, freed of the liens of the bonds. It follows, as hereinbefore stated, that the funds collected by the city by means of special assessments are trust funds, pledged to the payment of the bonds issued against each district. Public improvement bonds are instrumentalities for the spreading of local improvement assessments over a period of years, and the maintenance of the lien therefor against the property benefited. Assessments collected are public funds, impressed with a trust in favor of the bondholders. Jewell v. City of Superior, supra."

In addition to the foregoing cases holding such moneys to be trust funds, we may also cite the following: Conway v. City of Chicago, 237 Ill. 128, 86 N. E. 619; Wells v. Village of Wilmette, 193 Ill. App. 30; People v. Flynn, 265 Ill. 414, 106 N. E. 961.

In the case of Rothschild v. Village of Calumet Park, 262 Ill. App. 96, an action to enforce pro rata payment of bonds and interest coupons based upon a special assessment, it was held that the court might properly direct payment of a certain percentage of the moneys held by the treasurer or custodian of such funds, so as to pay to each bondholder his proportionate share of the trust fund.

[5, 6] In People ex rel. Security Trust Co. of Rochester v. Treasurer of Monroe County, 191 N. Y. 15, 83 N. E. 661, the court of appeals of the state of New York upheld a mandamus proceeding directing the payment of a percentage of the moneys collected based upon a special improvement assessment, where the moneys were insufficient to pay the entire indebtedness, holding that the bondholders were entitled to be paid such percentage pro rata out of the moneys in possession of the treasurer; that such distribution should not be delayed indefinitely or await the possibility of collecting all of the assessment, or until sufficient funds might possibly be collected to make payment in full. The procedure pointed out in that case, and also in the case decided by the appellate court of Illinois, supra, seems to us to be both just and equitable. The holding of those cases is to the effect that the treasurer or custodian of the funds collected on account of the special assessment may properly be required to pay, out of the funds so collected, to each of the bondholders, his proportionate share thereof, and that mandamus is a proper remedy; that the person bringing the mandamus proceedings is entitled only to his proportionate share; that the issuance of the writ is dependent upon there being a showing that there is sufficient money in the hands of the treasurer or custodian to make a substantial pro rata distribution. In the New York Case the amount distributed approximated 30 per cent. of the outstanding indebtedness.

It appearing from the record in this case that the respondent now has in her possession as custodian of the funds of reclamation district 2047, the sum of $50,878.50, against which there is an outstanding indebtedness due and payable in the sum of $65,340, distribution can be made of a substantial sum to the respective bondholders, and that at least payment can be made to the extent of 75 cents on each dollar of the indebtedness evidenced by the interest coupons now due.

It is therefore ordered that a writ of mandate issue directing the respondent to make payment in that sum to the petitioner herein, and also to the intervener.

I concur: R. L. THOMPSON, J.

SHAPIRO v. SHAPIRO.

Civ. 8588.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 17, 1932.

1. Divorce ⇐108, 150(2).

Wife need not prove each allegation of cruelty in her divorce complaint, but if enough material facts relied on to establish cruelty are proved, other findings may be disregarded as surplusage (Civ. Code, § 94).

2. Divorce ⇐286.

Whether wife's conduct toward husband amounted to cruelty or was sufficiently culpable to necessitate denial of divorce sought by her was fact question for trial court to determine on sharply conflicting evidence (Civ. Code, §§ 94, 122).

3. Divorce ⇐286.

It is within trial court's province to pass on weight and sufficiency of conflicting evidence in divorce suit.

4. Appeal and error ⇐1012(1).

Judgment cannot be reversed on appeal merely because greater weight or preponderance of evidence is on appellant's side, but only when there is total absence of competent evidence sustaining material findings.

5. Divorce ⇐286.

Trial court's determination on conflicting evidence as to valuation of, and income from, community property, awarded parties to divorce suit, is conclusive on appeal.

6. Divorce ⇐286.

Appellate court will presume that trial court properly awarded wife, granted divorce for extreme cruelty, larger share of community property than husband, in absence of clear showing of abuse of discretion (Civ. Code, § 146, par. 1, and § 148).

7. Divorce ⇐252.

Wife making out case of extreme cruelty in her suit for divorce on such ground was entitled to more than half of community property (Civ. Code, § 146, par. 1).

8. Divorce ⇐252.

Court's award of community property worth about $35,000 net and producing annual net income of $9,500 to wife granted divorce for extreme cruelty, and property worth only about $19,000 net and producing only $900 net annual income to husband, held not abuse of discretion (Civ. Code, § 146, par. 1, and § 148).

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; H. G. Jorgensen, Judge.

Action for divorce by Rebecca Shapiro against M. Shapiro, who filed a cross-complaint and plea of recrimination. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Affirmed.

Wyckoff, Gardner & Parker, of Watsonville, for appellant.

Edwin T. McMurray, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WOODWARD, Justice pro tem.

Plaintiff instituted an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, setting forth eleven specific acts of marital misconduct on the part of the defendant. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff and against the defendant's cross-complaint and plea of recrimination.

[1] Appellant states in his opening brief that as to several of the accusations pleaded by plaintiff and found to be true by the court, the evidence is in "substantial conflict," but urges, nevertheless, that the judgment should be reversed for the reason that his own recriminatory plea was fully established. This, of course, is rather an indefinite challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence. It is not suggested, we may observe parenthetically, that the accusations of plaintiff concerning which the evidence was in conflict, were trivial in character, and for this reason it is immaterial whether other accusations, covered by the findings, were supported by the evidence. It was not necessary that plaintiff should prove each of the allegations of cruelty set forth in her complaint. If enough of the material facts relied on were proved to fulfill the definition of extreme cruelty as it appears in section 94 of the Civil Code, other findings may be disregarded as surplusage. Avery v. Avery, 148 Cal. 239, 246, 82 P. 967; Hawkins v. Hawkins, 104 Cal. App. 608, 613, 286 P. 747.

Before discussing appellant's point with reference to his recriminatory defense, it seems pertinent to allude briefly to the evidence adduced in support of the wife's cause of action. We do not, however, deem it necessary to set forth all of the acts of appellant pleaded by the plaintiff and found by the trial court to have been committed. A few of them will suffice.

Plaintiff testified that her husband possessed a violent temper, was in the habit of calling her vile and obscene names, and, on several occasions, slapped her face, beat, and choked her. These instances of personal violence usually climaxed a quarrel between the couple concerning money matters, or the defendant's business. On March 3, 1930, according to the wife's testimony, she suggested to appellant that he pay certain notes at one of the banks in Salinas; appellant immediately resented the suggestion and during a quarrel that ensued struck plaintiff over the head with a heavy book. Sam Shapiro, elder son of the couple, testified that on one occasion (he could not fix the date) he had seen defendant throw a book at plaintiff; that it "glanced off the top of my mother's head and hit her glasses and knocked her glasses back." This witness corroborated his mother as to other instances of appellant's violence. He recalled that, on another occasion, the defendant attacked plaintiff while she was in the kitchen, knocking her down, and otherwise mistreating her. The boy further testified that he had frequently heard his father call the plaintiff vile names, including "whore," and threaten to kill her. One instance of defendant's misconduct is best told in the boy's own language: "Q. How did you happen to leave military school? A. One day my father came down there and he came out with my mother and got me, and on the way my mother started to tell him how much I learned and everything while I was there, and my father told her that he spent a lot of money on me that he would not have to if it was not for her, because he could have trained me just as well at home, and then he got mad and started to going faster and faster in his car and he told us he was going off the road and into the fence and kill us all, and I talked to him and I cried and he told us that he would run into the fence and then he cooled off a little bit. * * *"

Charles Nadeau, a laborer, testified that during the latter part of the year 1929 he saw the defendant strike plaintiff and knock her down. "Q. (By the Court) You say he knocked her down? A. Yes. Q. Tell what was done then? Let's get that over with. A. Well, in the house they lived in the kitchen is a small one and the dining room is a small one and she was coming from the kitchen into this dining room and he hit her and knocks her down and shoves his fingers toward her eyes, and if I remember right he knocked her glasses off."

Mrs. Ted Hennekin, a neighbor, testified that during the month of November, 1929, she heard a "lot of commotion" in the defendant's home "like blows being struck" and heard plaintiff say, "Don't, please don't." E. J. Emerick, a former employee of the defendant, testified that in October, 1927, he saw the defendant kick plaintiff and heard him call her "an old whore."

"Q. When Mr. Shapiro kicked Mrs. Shapiro, what position was she in? A. She was stooping over.

"Q. Describe exactly how it was done. A. He come up behind her and she was stooped over and he kicked her over. * * *

"Q. Did you see any more conflict between them? A. Yes.

"Q. What was said or done? A. He said that he was going to kill her if she didn't get out, and he picked up a shovel and was going to hit her with it. * * *

"Q. When he had the shovel raised up, what happened? A. She ran into the house."

Appellant now takes the position that his conduct, "if not always justified," in almost every instance was the result of great provocation, and that plaintiff, not having come into court with clean hands, should have been denied a divorce. "Recrimination is a showing by the defendant of any cause of divorce against the plaintiff, in bar of the plaintiff's cause of divorce." Civ. Code, § 122. It has been said that while a plaintiff's conduct may fall short of the statutory definition of cruelty, yet it may be sufficiently culpable to warrant the court in denying any relief to plaintiff, especially if such conduct was of a kind calculated to cause the acts charged against the defendant. 9 Cal. Jur. 690.

[2-4] The provocative conduct, described in great detail by appellant at the trial and on which he apparently relied as an offset for his own derelictions, seems to have been a firm, and sometimes angry, insistence on the part of the wife that she be given a voice in the management of his business affairs. According to appellant's testimony, Mrs. Shapiro went to his junk yard daily where, without his consent and over his protests, she bought and sold goods, and gave directions to employees. Frequently, he went on to testify, she disagreed with him concerning details of the business, and on such occasions called him a "lazy bum" and other uncomplimentary names. She kept a watchful eye on his bank account, and, on one occasion, according to appellant's version, she visited the bank where his funds were deposited and made derogatory remarks in the presence of officials concerning his credit. Appellant testified that his domestic troubles reached a climax when he undertook to improve certain real property which he owned at Salinas. The improvements consisted of a hotel and several small cottages, the property being referred to at the trial as "Bungalow de Luxe Court." During the construction of these buildings, he averred, plaintiff asserted herself in an officious and meddlesome manner; she insisted on giving orders to the contractor and workmen, and, on one occasion, demanded that certain changes be made in the plans which necessitated expensive alterations in work partially completed. A number of witnesses corroborated appellant as to plaintiff's presence and activity during the building operations. Several of these witnesses insisted that plaintiff endeavored to superintend the work, and, while so doing, often spoke harshly and contemptuously of appellant. Other witnesses, called on behalf of plaintiff, gave an entirely different version of her activities. For example, Fred Miller, one of the carpenters engaged in building bungalow court, testified in part as follows:

"Q. Did Mrs. Shapiro ever interfere with you as a workman on the place? A. No, other than to suggest things. * * *

"Q. Was her approach to you and her talk to you—was that in a commanding and antagonistic way or was it asking your opinion on whatever it was? A. It was just simply asking my opinion or my suggestion.

"Q. Did it in any way interfere or retard you as a workman in your work? A. It didn't."

Plaintiff's own explanation of her "interference" with the building operations undoubtedly satisfied the trial court that she had been actuated solely by a desire to be helpful and not to annoy or harass the appellant. The following excerpt from her testimony is typical of plaintiff's explanations:

"Q. Did you tell him (her husband) your opinion of different things? A. Yes. When we first built the garages he used to go away for a week or two weeks and at that time we had the foundation already and we had the apartments and I said that they shall not work on the front walls of the two houses and

I thought it would take fifteen feet and then when it came I explained to him and showed him the little sketch I had made and when he went back and talked and I showed where he would have an income from these two apartments, three-room apartments.—

"Q. Did you show him that sketch you made? A. Yes.

"Q. Did he use that sketch? A. Well, he didn't want to. He swore and said it was not my business but he went and built it and took my advice."

Without quoting further from the voluminous transcript in this case, it is patent from the foregoing excerpts that there was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to the conduct of plaintiff. That she possessed a sharp tongue and was sometimes contentious and vituperative in her attitude towards defendant is indicated by much of the testimony, but whether her conduct, as a whole, amounted to cruelty, or was sufficiently culpable to necessitate a denial of the relief sought by her was a question of fact addressed to the court below. The trial court doubtless concluded from all the facts and circumstances of the case that the plaintiff's linguistic excesses and other faults, if any, were negligible in comparison with the brutality and torrential obscenity of the defendant. And it scarcely seems necessary to add that, where the evidence is conflicting, as in the present case, it is within the province of the trial court to pass upon its weight and sufficiency. A judgment cannot be reversed on appeal merely because the greater weight or preponderance of the evidence is on the side of one party or the other, but only when there is a total absence of competent evidence to sustain a material finding. Jennings v. Weibel, 204 Cal. 488, 268 P. 901; Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 30 P. 208; Hill v. Hill, 106 Cal. App. 309, 313, 289 P. 227; Thoele v. Thoele, 102 Cal. App. 387, 393, 282 P. 1001.

[5-8] Lastly, appellant urges that the trial court was harsh and unjust to him in its assignment of the community property and that the judgment should at least be revised on appeal. Plaintiff was awarded certain real property situate in the city of Salinas and referred to for convenience as "Bungalow de Luxe Court," together with all furnishings and equipment belonging thereto. In addition, the defendant was ordered to pay her $150 a month for the support of herself and two minor children until the entry of the final decree. The court found the value of the real property awarded plaintiff to be in the sum of $59,789.75, which, deducting an incumbrance of $24,100 with accumulated interest in the sum of $842.50, to be assumed by plaintiff, leaves a net value of $34,847.25. The defendant received the remainder of the community property, consisting of the "north Main street lots," valued at $19,000, the "Harvest street lot," valued at $1,000, and miscellaneous personal property having an aggregate value of $3,099.73. The total value of the community property thus assigned to the defendant, less certain debts in the sum of $3,631.51, which, assuming he must pay, is $19,468.22. Appellant complains that the court adopted the lowest valuation testified to with reference to the property awarded plaintiff, and the highest for the property awarded the defendant. It is contended also that the court disregarded, with resultant prejudice and injustice to appellant, the fact that the bungalow court property produced a net income of $9,500 for the year next preceding the trial, while the net income for the same period from the property awarded defendant was only $900. Basing his argument on testimony, which seems to have been received for an entirely different purpose, appellant contends that plaintiff was awarded property paying 6 per cent. on $158,333. This contention possesses more plausibility than substance. The defendant himself did not claim, while testifying, that the property in question was worth more than $65,000. Moreover, the evidence was conflicting both as to valuation and income, and in these circumstances the trial court's determination is conclusive on appeal. Nor does the fact that plaintiff was awarded a larger share of the community property than defendant necessarily indicate an abuse of discretion on the part of the court below. Section 146, paragraph one, of the Civil Code provides that, when the divorce is granted on the ground of adultery, or extreme cruelty, "the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just." It is true, as pointed out by appellant, that, under section 148 of the same Code, the appellate court may modify or revise an award of community property "in all particulars, including those which are stated to be in the discretion of the court." But unless there is a clear showing of an abuse of discretion, it will be presumed that the trial court acted properly, even though the decree may appear harsh. Rose v. Rose, 112 Cal. 341, 44 P. 658; Lynch v. Lynch, 69 Cal. App. 66, 230 P. 462; White v. White, 86 Cal. 219, 24 P. 996. Moreover, the plaintiff having made out her case of extreme cruelty was entitled to more than one-half of the community property. Brown v. Brown, 60 Cal. 579, 580; Thomsen v. Thomsen, 31 Cal. App. 185, 188, 159 P. 1054; Nave v. Nave, 35 Cal. App. 27, 169 P. 253. Indeed, it has been expressly held, as a uniform rule, that "when the decree is on the ground of extreme cruelty the award to the unoffending spouse must be substantially greater than that to the one who is at fault." Quagelli v. Quagelli, 99 Cal. App. 172, 178, 277 P. 1089, 1091. We cannot say there was an abuse of discretion by the court in its award of community property to plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITE v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO et al., and three other cases.

Civ. 915–919.

District Court of Appeal, Fourth District, California.

Sept. 28, 1932.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1932.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 25, 1932.

1. Pleading ⇐36(1).

Pleader is bound by interpretation adopted by him in his pleading.

2. Appeal and error ⇐882(3).

Plaintiffs, defeated on pleadings seeking liquidated damages accruing under unfulfilled options to purchase riparian lands, could not ask for reversal on theory of moneys due in payment for privilege granted.

3. Damages ⇐78(6).

Agreement to pay specified damages if city constructed dam and failed to exercise option to purchase riparian lands held "penalty" and not recoverable (Civ. Code, § 1671).

Facts disclosed that the city did not agree to build a dam nor purchase riparian lands, and that, in so far as the amount of specified damages applied to the city's failure to exercise its option, it was but an attempt to compel the acceptance of the option by the city, and, in so far as the amount applied to the construction of the dam, it was not the fixing of damages sustained for the "breach" of an agreement within Civ. Code, § 1671, permitting parties to liquidate damages in advance for breach of contract, but for the performance thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions of "Penalty," see Words and Phrases.]

4. Damages ⇐78(6).

When, with giving of option, there is coupled a provision for amount to be paid in case option be not accepted, such amount is a "penalty" and not recoverable.

This is so, since such additional provision is so inconsistent with the purpose and intent of the "option" which, by its very nature, vests in the optionee the exclusive right to determine whether the option shall be accepted or rejected, that it necessarily follows that the fixing of such amount was intended as either penalty for failure to perform in certain manner, or attempt to insure such performance, and is but a penalty in either case.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; A. C. Finney, Judge.

Actions by F. M. White, by Everett Peet and wife, by Lillian P. Judson and others, by Donald A. Moore and another, and by F. Herbert Judson and another against the city of San Diego and others. From judgments for defendants in all cases, the several plaintiffs appeal.

Affirmed.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for appellants.

C. L. Byers, of San Diego, for respondents.

SCOVEL, Justice pro tem.

The above-entitled actions, all based on analogous facts were consolidated for trial in the lower court. Judgment was entered in favor of defendants in all cases, from which judgments the several plaintiffs have appealed. The appeals have also been consolidated for hearing in this court.

From the transcript, it appears that in 1926 the city of San Diego was contemplating the construction of a dam on the San Dieguito river, in San Diego county, for the impounding of water to be diverted from the watershed to the city and used for domestic purposes. It was therefore necessary that the city purchase or condemn the lands of the riparian owners lying below the dam site. Negotiations for the purchase thereof were entered into, and as a result the option agreements upon which these various actions are based were executed. With the exception of the amounts set forth in such agreements they are, for the purpose of these appeals, identical. The Prentice option is typical. It recites the city's contemplated construction of the dam, known as the Sutherland dam, the pendency of an application by the city before the department of water rights for the right to appropriate and divert water from the San Dieguito river for domestic purposes and the desire of the city to purchase the lands lying below the dam and riparian to the river in order that it might proceed with the project without prejudice to the owners of such lands. The contractual provisions then follow whereby for a consideration of $50 the city is given the option for one year to purchase the land described therein for $125,000, with the right to renew or extend the option for an additional two years upon payment of $25,000. Upon acceptance of the option and payment of the purchase price, the landowner agrees to furnish good and sufficient deeds conveying the land to the city, together with a certificate of title thereto.

Then follows the disputed portion of the option agreement, from which this litigation arises. Set forth in full, it reads as follows:

"(a) It is understood by and between the Owner and the City that the City may, before it elects to exercise its option to purchase the Owner's land, as hereinbefore provided, begin the construction of the Sutherland dam, the construction of which would impound and divert from the San Dieguito River into another watershed a large portion of the storm waters that are accustomed to flow down the San Dieguito River and through the San Pasqual Valley toward the sea.

"(b) It is expressly understood and agreed by and between the Owner and the City that in the event the City should commence the construction of said dam and should not exercise its option to purchase the lands of the Owner the said Owner would sustain damages, but the exact amount of said damages is not ascertainable and the parties agree that from the very nature of the case it would be impossible and/or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage, and the City therefore promises and agrees that in the event it should construct the Sutherland dam and should not exercise its option to purchase the lands of the Owner, as in this contract provided, that it will pay to said Owner the sum of sixty-two thousand five hundred dollars ($62,500.00) as liquidated damages, and that said sum so determined as liquidated damages shall be due and payable from the City to the Owner on the day on which the said City, not having exercised its option to purchase the Owner's land, parts with said option and loses its right to purchase the lands of the Owner, as herein provided.

"(c) This obligation and promise on the part of the City to pay the aforesaid sum as liquidated damages, shall attach to and be binding upon the City upon the date on which it loses its option to purchase said lands, regardless of whether the Sutherland dam has been completed or whether water has actually been diverted."

The city did not purchase the lands during the first year of the option, but did pay the $25,000 for a two-year renewal or extension thereof. During the option periods, the city commenced the construction of Sutherland dam, and proceeded with the work until the structure was approximately 50 per cent. completed. At that time all work ceased and the dam virtually abandoned, although it was left in such condition that it might be completed some time in the future.

Thereafter, the option periods provided for in the various agreements expired without the city either purchasing the lands or making any of the payments provided for therein and referred to as liquidated damages, as set forth in the above-quoted portion of the Prentice option. The various plaintiffs filed their claims with the city for the allowance of the specified amounts set forth as "liquidated damages" in their respective options, which claims were refused, and thereupon these actions commenced.

The complaints are substantially the same. They recite the voting of bonds by the city of San Diego for the construction of Sutherland dam, the issuance and sale of such bonds, and the execution of the option agreements above described; copies thereof being attached to the complaints as exhibits. The complaints further allege with particularity that portion of the option agreement above quoted providing for the payment of liquidated damages in case Sutherland dam should be constructed and the city fail to exercise its option to purchase the lands described in the option. It is then alleged that, by reason of the city's commencement and prosecution of the construction of said dam and its failure to exercise its option to purchase, the plaintiffs have sustained actual damage; that, from the nature of the case and the existing circumstances at the time of the execution of such option agreement, it was impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the amount of damage that the owner of said lands would sustain by reason of the city's failure to exercise its option to purchase said lands, and, by reason of its commencing and prosecuting the construction of said dam, specifically setting forth various reasons therefor; that, by reason of the city's having commenced the construction of said dam and failing to purchase the lands described in such option agreement, the amount set forth therein as liquidated damages is due and payable as liquidated damages, for which amount judgment is asked. The answer of defendants is in the nature of a general denial, setting up certain special defenses which, however, are not involved in this appeal.

The court found that, if the Sutherland dam should be completed, it would impound the greater portion of the flow of the stream, and that the damage thereby occasioned plaintiffs, as riparian owners of land below the dam, would have been uncertain in amount and impracticable of ascertainment, but that the construction of such dam had not proceeded to a point where it in any way interrupted the natural flow of the stream, and that therefore none of the plaintiffs had sustained any actual damage thereby. The court further found that the execution of the agreements, giving the city an option to purchase plaintiffs' land for a three-year period, and the commencement of the construction of said dam, did interfere with and hinder the selling of said lands and the development and handling thereof by the plaintiffs during the life of said agreements; that the provision in each contract providing for liquidated damages in case the dam was commenced and further conditioned upon the failure of the city to exercise its option was in truth and in fact a penalty and unenforceable. Judgment in favor of the defendants was thereupon entered.

A great portion of appellants' brief consists of an argument to the effect that the damages claimed are neither liquidated damages nor a penalty, but an agreement on the part of the city to pay the amount set forth as liquidated damages for the right and privilege of constructing Sutherland dam, and not as damages that might be sustained by plaintiffs through the construction of the dam. He argues that the city had no right to construct a dam even upon lands riparian to the San Dieguito river which it might own where such construction was with the avowed purpose of diverting water from the watershed, without first purchasing or condemning the lands of lower riparian owners, citing Collier v. Merced Irrigation District, 213 Cal. 554, 2 P.(2d) 790. That the option agreement, and particularly that portion of it hereinabove quoted, gave to the city the right, however, to construct such dam without such purchase or condemnation upon payment to plaintiffs of the respective amounts therein set forth, although designated as liquidated damages; that a court is not bound by the terms used in an agreement, and even though the parties may designate the payment of moneys as liquidated damages, the court, in construing the provision therefor, will determine the same according to the fact, and not be bound by the terminology used by the parties; that the agreement involved herein, properly construed, provides for the granting of a right with two alternatives as consideration therefor; that is to say, that the city was given the right or privilege of constructing the dam, and as consideration therefor could either purchase plaintiffs' properties or pay the amount stipulated in the agreement—citing such cases as Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 26 N. E. 690, 10 L. R. A. 768; Johnston v. Cowan, 59 Pa. 275.

[1] It will be noted that the theory of the pleadings upon which these actions are based is entirely that of a recovery of the various amounts as liquidated damages. The complaint in each action alleges with great particularity that the commencement of the dam and failure of the city to purchase plaintiffs' lands caused actual "damage"; that the amount of such "damage" is impracticable and extremely difficult to fix, and that "the actual loss to the owner of said lands by reason of the city's failure to exercise its right to purchase the lands * * * and by reason of its commencing and prosecuting the construction of said Sutherland dam * * * was not ascertainable" for various reasons therein set forth. The complaint further alleges that, by reason of such action on the part of the city, the amount prayed for became due "as liquidated damages"; that plaintiffs filed with the city their various claims for damages "for the failure of said city to pay said sum agreed upon as liquidated damages." Considerable evidence was introduced at the trial upon the question of damage or injury to plaintiffs' lands. It is quite apparent, therefore, that the case was tried entirely upon the theory of a recovery of "liquidated damages" and not of moneys due in payment for a right or privilege granted. "The pleader is bound by the interpretation adopted by him and set forth in his pleading." Tennant v. Wilde, 98 Cal. App. 437, 277 P. 137, 143; Silvers v. Grossman, 183 Cal. 696, 192 P. 534.

[2] A plaintiff must recover, if at all, upon the issues framed by his pleadings, and cannot for the first time ask for a reversal in the appellate court upon a theory not embraced within the pleadings nor within the issues tried. It is quite possible that, had plaintiffs pleaded in the lower court the facts upon which they now ask for a reversal, defendant city might have set up other and additional defenses. It is sufficient for us to say that we are of the opinion the point now advanced by appellants cannot be considered. 2 Cal. Jur. 237; Merrill v. Kohlberg, 29 Cal. App. 382, 155 P. 824; U. S. Farm Land Co. v. Darter, 42 Cal. App. 292, 183 P. 696.

Appellants further contend, however, that the provisions for liquidated damages were valid and enforceable as such, and that they were therefore entitled to recover the stipulated sums. It will be noted that the parties apparently attempted to liquidate or fix in advance the damages that plaintiffs would sustain, not only by reason of construction of the dam, but also by reason of the failure of the city to purchase lands upon which it had been given an option. It might perhaps be conceded that the construction of a dam of the apparent size and magnitude of that herein involved would of necessity cause injury and damage to the riparian lands lying below the structure by impounding and diverting therefrom the flow of water to which such lands would be entitled as riparian to the stream upon which the dam was located. It might also be conceded that the amount of such damage would be "impracticable or extremely difficult to fix."

[3, 4] Civil Code, § 1671, however, only permits the parties to a contract to liquidate in advance damages which may be sustained by a breach of such contract. In the case at bar, the city did not agree to build a dam nor did it agree to purchase plaintiffs' lands. Any attempt to stipulate the amount of damages which plaintiffs might sustain through construction of the dam or failure to purchase their lands certainly was not the fixing of damages sustained by plaintiffs for the breach of an agreement, but rather for the performance thereof. Such is not within the purview of the statute. And, in so far as the amount stipulated applies to the failure of the city to purchase plaintiffs' lands, it is difficult to see how the fixing of such amount to be paid by the city for its failure to exercise an option which, according to the very terms of the option, might or might not be exercised by it in its own discretion, could be construed as other than an attempt to compel the acceptance of such option by the city. The very nature of an option vests in the optionee the exclusive right to determine whether the option shall be accepted or rejected, and when, with the giving of an option, there is coupled a provision for an amount to be paid in case the option be not accepted, such additional provision is so inconsistent with the purpose and intent of the option, it necessarily follows that the fixing of such amount was intended as either a penalty for failure to perform in a certain manner or an attempt to insure such performance. It is but a penalty in either case, and as such is not recoverable. 8 Cal. Jur. 844.

Certain findings of the court are also attacked. In finding No. 1, the court found that the city did not commence the construction of the dam by reason of or pursuant to the written consent of the plaintiffs contained in the option agreements. In finding No. 2, the court found that the damages which plaintiffs might have sustained, had the dam been completed, were a proper subject of agreement for liquidated damages, but that such damages were waived by plaintiffs and compensated for by the option money paid. In finding No. 3, the court found that the plaintiffs were not damaged by the partial construction of Sutherland dam. In finding No. 5, the court found that the mere commencement of the dam did not injure plaintiffs' lands in any manner, and in the nature of things could not cause any damage until the construction thereof reached a point where water was impounded or diverted by such dam, and in finding No. 6 found that any right given to the city to divert water from the San Dieguito river was dependent upon the consummation of the purchase of plaintiffs' lands and the completion of the dam. Having reached the conclusion that the amounts prayed for are not recoverable by reason of the invalidity of the provision therefor itself, any error in such findings becomes immaterial.

The judgments appealed from are affirmed.

The facts in this case are identical with those in the case of F. M. White v. City of San Diego et al. (Cal. App.) 14 P.(2d) 1062, except the description of the property involved and the payments set forth in the option agreement upon which the action is based. The decision in the White Case has this day been filed. The questions of law involved in the instant case are identical with those in the White Case.

Therefore, for the reasons given in the case of White v. City of San Diego et al., the judgment in this case is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Robert Roy McFarlan was convicted of violating the Firearms Act, and he appeals.

Affirmed.

Tom Okawara, of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

AMES, Justice pro tem.

The appellant was convicted of a violation of the provisions of section 2 of an act of the Legislature approved June 13, 1923, commonly known as the "Firearms Act" (St. 1923, p. 695, as amended by St. 1931, p. 2316). The charging part of the information is as follows: "The District Attorney of the County of Fresno hereby accuses Robert Roy McFarlan of a felony to-wit: Possession by an exconvict of a firearm capable of being concealed upon the person, in that on or about the 27th day of May, 1932, in the County of Fresno, State of California, he had in his possession and under his custody and control a firearm having a barrel less than twelve inches in length, to-wit: a revolver; he, the said defendant, being then and there a person who had previously been convicted of a felony against the person and property of another."

In addition to the foregoing allegation in the information appellant is further charged with three prior convictions, namely, petit larceny, for which it is alleged he served a term in a state reformatory in the state of Indiana; burglary and embezzlement, for each of which he is alleged to have served terms in state prisons in California.

After being arraigned the appellant pleaded not guilty to the charge contained in the information, but admitted the three prior convictions and further pleaded once in jeopardy.

[1, 2] At the trial appellant offered in evidence a certified copy of a complaint which had been previously filed in the police court of the city of Fresno, charging him with the crime of carrying a concealed weapon, in violation of section 5 of the said Firearms Act, together with the entries from the docket of said police court, from which it appears that the appellant was convicted as charged in the complaint and was sentenced by the court to pay a fine of $25, or, in case said fine be not paid, that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Fresno until the fine was duly satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment to every $2 of the fine. Appellant also offered in evidence the commitment issued out of said police court, committing him to the county jail pursuant to the judgment of the court. To this offer the district attorney objected and the objection was sustained. Section 2 of the Firearms Act, in so far as it is pertinent to the issues involved here, is as follows: "On and after the date upon which this act takes effect, no unnaturalized foreign born person and no person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or against the government of the United States or of the State of California or of any political subdivision thereof shall own or have in his possession or under his custody or control any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person. The terms 'pistol,' 'revolver,' and 'firearms capable of being concealed upon the person' as used in this act shall be construed to apply to and include all firearms having a barrel less than twelve inches in length."

The provisions of section 5 of said act, under which appellant was convicted in the police court, are as follows: "Except as otherwise provided in this act, it shall be unlawful for any person within this state to carry concealed upon his person or within any vehicle which is under his control or direction any pistol, revolver or other firearm capable of being concealed upon the person without having a license to carry such firearm as hereinafter provided in section eight hereof. Any person who violates the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and if he has been convicted previously of any felony, or of any crime made punishable by this act, he is guilty of a felony."

Appellant contends that the crime of which he was convicted in the police court is the same offense of which he was charged in the superior court and that his conviction in the police court is a bar to the present action. He relies upon section 654 of the Penal Code, which is in part as follows: "An act or omission which is made punishable in different ways by different provisions of this code may be punished under either of such provisions, but in no case can it be punished under more than one; an acquittal or conviction and sentence under either one bars a prosecution for the same act or omission under any other."

That section was referred to and construed in the case of People v. Johnson, 82 Cal. App. 411, 256 P. 273, 274. In that case the defendant was charged with the crime of practising medicine without a license. He attempted to plead once in jeopardy and to prove in support thereof a former charge of abortion. In that case the court said: "The fact that the evidence may have been the same in both cases and that the proof in the former case may have been sufficient to warrant a conviction in the latter does not necessarily establish the claim that the defendant had been once in jeopardy or had been acquitted of the second charge. An acquittal or a conviction upon one charge is not a bar to a conviction upon another, if the evidence required to support the former is not sufficient to warrant a conviction upon the latter without proof of any additional fact. Ebeling v. Morgan, 237 U. S. 625, 59 L. Ed. 1151, 35 S. Ct. 710 [see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes]. 'The true test is: * * * Could the defendant have been convicted upon the first indictment upon proof of the facts, not as brought forward in evidence, but as alleged in the record of the second.' State v. Nash, 86 N. C. 650, 41 Am. Rep. 472; People v. Brannon, 70 Cal. App. 225, 233 P. 88; People v. Mehra, 73 Cal. App. 162, 238 P. 802. The alleged fact that the defendant committed the offense of practicing medicine without a license does not even tend to show that he committed the crime of abortion."

In the case of People v. Day, 199 Cal. 78, 248 P. 250, 252, the indictment contained two counts, the first of which accused the defendant of the crime of assault with caustic chemicals; the second count charged her with the same offense, different phraseology having been adopted. The defendant was convicted on count 1 and acquitted on count 2 and contended that an acquittal on count 2 would operate as an acquittal of the charge contained in count 1 because, as she claimed, the offenses therein charged were identical. In upholding the judgment of the lower court the appellate court said:

"It may be conceded that, if the two counts stated precisely the same offense, an acquittal upon one count would operate as an acquittal upon the other count. * * * It is not the great similarity in most of the facts constituting separate offenses, but the presence of a fact necessary in one offense and absent in another, that determines whether offenses are separate. Murphy v. United States (C. C. A.) 285 F. 801, 814; Gavieres v. U. S., 220 U. S. 338, 342, 55 L. Ed. 489, 31 S. Ct. 421 [see, also, Rose's U. S. Notes]; Morey v. Commonwealth, 108 Mass. 433.

"This is the test used to determine the validity of a plea of once in jeopardy interposed to a subsequent indictment after an acquittal or conviction upon one indictment."

The test to be applied to a plea of former jeopardy is again stated in the case of People v. Nelson, 70 Cal. App. 476, 233 P. 406, 407, in which the court said: "It has repeatedly been held that one test applicable to determine the identity of the offense is to ascertain if the evidence which is necessary to support the second information was admissible under the former, and was sufficient if believed by the jury, to have warranted a conviction of that crime."

The fact that the same testimony is necessary to establish both the offense with which the defendant is charged and the one upon which he bases his claim of former jeopardy is not the test. In the case of In re O'Connor, 80 Cal. App. 647, 252 P. 730, 732, it is said: "But where, as here, entirely separate and distinct offenses are charged in two counts, and one is not necessarily included within the other, a prosecution for one is no bar to a prosecution for the other, even though the same testimony may be applicable to both."

It will be noted that the elements of the offense of which the appellant was convicted in the police court are entirely different from those contained in the charge of which he was later convicted in the superior court. The failure of the accused to procure a license to carry such weapon is an element of the offense charged under section 5 which is entirely lacking in the offense charged under section 2. On the other hand, the essence of the crime denounced by section 2 of the act under consideration is that the accused should be a "person who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another or against the government of the United States or of the state of California or any political subdivision thereof." From a comparison of these two sections of the act the conclusion is inevitable that the complaint in the police court charged an offense entirely different from that of which the appellant was convicted in the superior court; that the elements of the two offenses were materially different; and that therefore he was not placed in jeopardy nor did the court err in sustaining objections to the proffered evidence.

[3] The appellant next contends that the information does not charge the commission of a public offense, in that it does not sufficiently inform him as to the place where and the time when he was formerly convicted of the felony, nor the court in which such conviction was obtained, nor the name of the penal institution in which he was confined. The charging part of the information which is hereinabove quoted follows the language of the statute and we think that in this case such allegation is sufficient. It was so held in the case of People v. Bertolani, 69 Cal. App. 137, 230 P. 675. The defendant in that case was prosecuted under section 2 of the Firearms Act and the information in that case alleged: "The said L. Bertolani * * * being then and there an unnaturalized foreign-born person, did willfully, unlawfully," etc. The court said: "Every fact necessary to constitute the offense defined by the act in question is charged in the information. It therefore sufficiently charges a public offense." It will also be noted that the foregoing case was decided in 1924, prior to the amendments to sections 951 and 952 of the Penal Code allowing greater latitude in criminal pleadings.

[4] Appellant earnestly contends that the court erred in permitting the introduction in evidence of a copy of certain records of the state prison at Folsom, together with a copy of the minutes of certain meetings of the board of prison directors of that institution. The records so received in evidence disclose the fact that the appellant had, in May, 1921, been committed to the state prison at Folsom by the superior court of Los Angeles county, after a conviction in that court of the crime of embezzlement. A resolution of the board of prison directors discloses that the length of the confinement of appellant under the commitment from Los Angeles county was, on the 11th day of June, 1926, fixed at six years. Other minutes record the proceedings of the board of directors in granting a parole. There is also attached to this exhibit a "descriptive card" containing a minute physical description of appellant with detailed statements as to his personal history, from which it appears that he was what is known in prison parlance as a "third termer." To this is also annexed a photographic reproduction of his finger prints and photographs showing a profile and a front view of the appellant.

Appellant urges that the introduction of this record was prejudicial error. In order to prove that the appellant was "a person who had previously been convicted of a felony" as alleged in the information, it was competent to introduce portions of the records of the prison within which he had been confined. Section 969b of the Penal Code provides as follows: "For the purpose of establishing prima facie evidence of the fact that a person being tried for a crime or public offense under the laws of this state has been convicted of an act punishable by imprisonment in the state prison of this state, and has served a term therefor in any penal institution, or has been convicted of an act in any other state, which would be punishable as a crime in this state, and has served a term therefor in any state penitentiary or reformatory, or has been convicted of an act declared to be a crime by any act or law of the United States, and has served a term therefor in any penal institution, the records or copies of records of any state penitentiary or reformatory or federal penitentiary in which such person has been imprisoned, when such records or copies thereof have been certified by the official custodian of such records, may be introduced as such evidence."

[5] His conviction of the prior offense could have been proven without the introduction of the extraneous matters contained in the prison records. However, all of the records above referred to were offered in evidence as one exhibit and the objection thereto was general, upon the ground that the same was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. In presenting his objection counsel for the appellant, in referring to the proffered exhibit, said: "It contains a lot of surplus matter not pertaining to any conviction whatsoever." But he failed to point out in his objection or at any time during the trial, to what surplus matter he referred. Nor did he differentiate between that portion of the exhibit which was material and competent and that which should have been excluded. In fairness to the court and counsel, we think he should have pointed out whatever portions of the exhibit were objectionable.

[6] Appellant next contends that it was error for the court to permit the people to introduce evidence of his prior conviction of embezzlement (which had been admitted by appellant when he entered his plea) in order to prove that he was a person who had been previously convicted of a felony as alleged in the information. Ordinarily it would be error to refer to any such conviction, and a violation of the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code; but in this case the prior conviction is of the essence of the crime with which the appellant was charged and is a part of the res gestae. In the case of People v. Forrester, 116 Cal. App. 240, 2 P.(2d) 558, 559, after quoting from section 1025 of the Penal Code, the court says: "If the foregoing provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code apply to the offense of which the defendant was convicted in this action, it would be impossible ever to convict the defendant on this charge. For the offense described in the indictment includes, as a substantive part of the offense, the fact that the person charged with having in his possession the prohibited firearm is a person 'who has been convicted of a felony against the person or property of another,' etc. Notwithstanding the fact that the defendant upon his arraignment admitted the prior conviction, as separately stated in the indictment, he pleaded not guilty to the principal offense and thereby put in issue the alleged fact that, at the stated time and place, he had in his possession the described firearm, he having been theretofore legally convicted of a felony, to wit, burglary, etc. Considering the two statutes together, we are satisfied that the provisions of section 1025 of the Penal Code were not intended to apply to a case where the fact of former conviction is an integral part of the present offense concerning which the defendant is brought to trial. If any additional ground of reconcilement of the two statutes should seem to be necessary, the fact may be noted that the Firearms Act of 1923 is of much later date than said section of the Penal Code, and is of necessity, pro tanto, a repeal of said section 1025, Penal Code."

[7] Lastly, the appellant contends that the court erred in adjudging appellant to be an habitual criminal. Section 644 of the Penal Code provides in part as follows: "Every person convicted in this state of any felony who shall have been previously twice convicted upon charges separately brought and tried, and served a term therefor in any state prison and/or federal penitentiary, either in this state or elsewhere, of the crime of * * * grand theft * * * shall be adjudged an habitual criminal." The crime of embezzlement, says appellant, is not enumerated among the felonies, two previous convictions of which are necessary to authorize an adjudication that the accused is an habitual criminal. However, this contention is answered by the provisions of section 490a of the Penal Code. "Wherever any law or statute of this state refers to or mentions larceny, embezzlement, or stealing, said law or statute shall hereafter be read and interpreted as if the word 'theft' were substituted therefor." It will be noted that appellant's former conviction of embezzlement occurred in 1925. At that time the crime of embezzlement was a separate and distinct crime from that of theft. However, in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1046), the definition of embezzlement, larceny, and other similar offenses, were consolidated in section 484 of the Penal Code and designated as the crime of "theft." All of the elements of the crime formerly designated as embezzlement are now incorporated and included in the crime of theft and the designation of the word "theft" in section 644 of the Penal Code must be construed as including the crime which was formerly designated as embezzlement. We find no error in the record prejudicial to the rights of appellant.

KRETZSCHMAR et al. v. JANSS INV. CO. et al.

Civ. 7420.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California.

Oct. 10, 1932.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇐49.

Under option contract whereby vendor reserved rights of way for public utilities and easement for drainage pipes or conduits, vendor's dedication of drainage easement under which county constructed flood control ditch held unauthorized.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐351(6).

Purchaser's damages for vendor's unauthorized dedication of drainage easement held erroneously limited to costs of constructing bridge over storm drain, proper measure of damages being diminished value of land because of easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by Fred Kretzschmar and another against the Janss Investment Company and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal.

Reversed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Paul Watkins and Keith Bullitt, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

Maynard J. Givens, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

TAPPAAN, Justice pro tem.

The judgment from which this appeal is taken, gave to respondents the sum of $1,750, and provided that appellants take nothing by their cross-complaint.

The action as instituted by respondents was one for fraud. The appellants filed an answer to respondents' complaint and also a cross-complaint by which they sought to quiet title, as against respondents, to the lot or parcel of land involved in the cause of action as alleged by respondents in their complaint. The various transactions had by appellants in reference to the real property here involved were had with respondent Josie Kretzschmar. It would appear that her husband, Fred Kretzschmar, was joined in the proceeding merely by reason of his marital relationship.

The facts from which this controversy arose present but few conflicts of evidence and are as to most of the material issues undisputed. The evidence introduced at the trial was in large part documentary. Respondent Josie Kretzschmar on February 14, 1924, entered into a written option to purchase from appellants a certain lot or parcel of real property for the sum of $2,500 upon terms in said option specified. This instrument contained the following clauses: "It is understood that the Janss Investment Co. will reserve the right to grade or fill said property, and to construct street improvements, rights of way for public utilities, drainage, etc., right to impose such reasonable building restrictions and use restrictions on the respective lots of said tract as it may in its judgment deem most beneficial to such lots; that the property described in this option will be sold only subject to such restrictions and reservations and also to any rights of way or other easements now of record." (Italics ours.) It appears from the record here that the lot upon which this option was given was much lower than the other lots in the same tract and that running across it there was a so-called wash where flood waters from lands above it at times flowed. It also appears that the price named in the option was less than that of the other lots in the tract. Appellant desired to purchase the lot with the view to making use of it as a garden and later placed there improvements useful for that purpose. Respondent Josie Kretzschmar testified: "The only representations which the agents of Janss Investment Company or any of its representatives made regarding this property other than what was contained in the written instrument itself was that we could put any building on there except a dairy or pig farm."

On April 22, 1924, appellants dedicated to the Los Angeles County Flood Control a strip of land through the lot upon which respondent held the above referred to option, and on the same day such dedication was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. There is nothing in the record to show that respondents knew of this contemplated dedication nor that they knew that a work of the kind which was thereafter constructed upon this easement was to be placed upon the lot, until the time that it was actually constructed, some two years later.

The next day after the dedication above referred to, the parties to the option made and entered into a formal contract of sale for the lot in question. This contract contained the following paragraphs which are pertinent to this inquiry: "The buyer shall have immediate possession of said property * * * provided the buyer shall faithfully perform each and every obligation herein undertaken by him, * * * the seller shall deliver to the buyer * * * a deed of grant for said property, together with a certificate of title * * * showing the title to said property to be vested in the grantor named in said deed, free and clear of incumbrances, except the conditions, restrictions and reservations herein described. * * * 5. A perpetual easement is hereby reserved to the seller and its successors and assigns, in and over said real property, for the construction, maintenance and operation therein or thereon of drainage pipes or conduits and pipes, conduits, poles, wires and other means of conveying to and from lots in said tract gas, electricity, power, water, telephone and telegraph service, sewage and other things of convenience to the owners of lots in said tract." The lot agreed to be sold to respondents was described in this contract as "Lot number 11, * * * according to a map of said tract filed for record in Map Book 93 at pages 12, 13 of the records of said county." This map so referred to was the one that dedicated the right of way or easement to the Los Angeles County Flood Control and was placed of record the day before the contract was signed. The contract also contained the following clause: "The buyer hereby certifies that he has personally inspected the property herein described, has examined and checked map of same and knows that this property is the identical property he selected and purchased."

Respondents entered upon the lot so agreed to be sold and expended in the improvement thereof for the purpose of gardening thereon the sum of $2,000 before they had actual notice of the dedication of the easement to the flood control. Some two years after respondents went into possession of the lot in question, the flood control entered upon the lot and constructed across it, upon the easement granted by appellants, a storm drain. This easement as granted had a width of 75 feet and there is evidence that in parts of its length through the lot that earth had been taken from the ditch and placed along the easement so that the space occupied was 100 or more feet across. The right of way had erected along it a wire fence some 5 or 6 feet in height. These works so erected cut the lot into two parts, leaving the improvements erected by respondents upon one part and this part completely cut off from the other part of the lot, by the ditch, banks of earth, and two wire fences.

[1] Appellants' first contention is that "The right to create the drainage easement was specifically reserved in both the written option and the written contract." This contention is based upon certain parts of the clauses of the option and contract of sale hereinbefore quoted. In the option there is a reservation of "rights of way for public utilities, drainage, etc.," while in the contract of sale the following is found: "A perpetual easement is hereby reserved to the Seller * * for the construction, maintenance and operation therein or thereon of drainage pipes or conduits. * * *" It will be noted that the words just quoted from the option are but a part of a general clause covering the right of the grantor of the option to improve the tract of which the lot in question was a part, and that read in conjunction with the rest of the paragraph would not convey to the general reader the thought that a work of the scope and magnitude of the flood control ditch was to be constructed, but rather that it had reference to improvements contemplated by the appellants in their development of the tract. There is no evidence in the record that appellants at any time told respondents of this proposed improvement to be constructed by a public agency nor that respondents were informed or knew that such a work was contemplated; one that would take the major part of the lot that they were about to purchase, and render the larger part left remaining, inaccessible.

The contract of sale which respondents accepted referred to the map upon which the easement was shown, but there is no evidence that respondents ever saw this map nor that their attention was ever called to it. This map was filed for record but a few hours before this contract was presented to respondents. It would seem that in common justice that appellants should have at this time by some act on their part directed respondents' attention to the material change that had been made in the lot by the dedication of this easement. The contract reserved the right to construct drainage pipes and conduits upon the property. Appellants cite authorities to the effect that conduit may mean canal or ditch. This may be true in some cases when the surrounding circumstances justify the use of the word in its broadest sense, but here when read in connection with the contract as a whole, no such meaning can be attached to the term. The option, when entered into, defined the limits of the contractual relation of the parties, and respondents were justified in standing upon its terms. Respondents never consented to any change or modification of this option. The property covered by the option did materially change in character and appellants had knowledge of this change, but failed to call it to the attention of respondents and so deprived them of the right to withdraw from the purchase. The instant case is one where one is induced to enter into a contract by "the suppression of that which is true, by one having knowledge or belief of the fact." Civ. Code, § 1572, subd. 3. The instant case differs from those cases where a deed is given as the closing incident of a purchase of land and constitutes an expression of the terms of the agreement reached in the transaction by the parties. Here the contract, in so far as an agreement of the parties upon the subject-matter had been reached, was evidenced by the option made some months before the contract of sale was delivered. The respondents were justified in relying upon this option and a duty rested upon the appellants to inform them of any material changes in the subject-matter which had taken place subsequent to the option. Hargrove v. Henderson, 108 Cal. App. 667, 292 P. 148. In view of the fact that this case must be reversed upon another ground, further consideration of this phase of the case is deemed to be unnecessary here.

[2] Appellants attack the finding of the trial court as to the damages allowed respondents, contending that there is no evidence to sustain the finding of damages in the sum of $1,750. The court's finding in this regard is as follows: "That it is true that the giving, granting, or dedicating of the easement or right of way to the Los Angeles County Flood Control by the defendants, to and over the plaintiffs' property and the construction of the ditch thereon as aforesaid, has damaged the plaintiffs' said real property hereinabove described and has and does now prevent the ingress and egress of plaintiffs and both of them to the easterly portion of their said real property and the building and improvements therein situated and that by reason thereof the plaintiffs have been damaged in the sum of $1,750.00, the approximate cost of a bridge to cross the said easement or right-of-way on plaintiffs' property. (Italics ours.) The only testimony offered at the trial on the subject of damages is that of respondent Fred Kretzschmar. He testified to the fact of the erection of the barrier by the flood control and that he was thereby cut off from access to a part of the lot in question; to the value of the improvements placed upon the property; and that he could cross the wash from one part to the other before the flood control was erected. He testified: "I have had an estimate of $1,750.00 as the cost of a bridge across the ditch and two bids of $233.00 and $250.00 for leveling off the dirt on either side of the ditch. If I had a bridge across the ditch I could go back and forth but $1,750.00 would not completely eliminate my damage."

From the finding made by the court and from the evidence offered at the trial, it is obvious that the measure of damages adopted by the court was confined solely to the cost of a bridge. There is no evidence as to the kind or character of the bridge or as to whether it was one reasonably necessary for the use required of it. There can be found in the record no evidence as to the detriment caused to the land involved by the structure complained of by respondents. The damages suffered must arise from the diminished value of the land by reason of the easement granted by appellants. The record here discloses no evidence upon this subject. "The real question in all such cases is whether or not the property, if it had been as represented, would have been of substantially greater value than its actual value in its real condition." Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 390, 92 P. 1011, 1015. In the case of Rogaff v. Bartles, 115 Cal. App. 429, 1 P.(2d) 517, will be found a discussion on this subject, together with a collection of the authorities thereon.

Inasmuch as there is no evidence to support the finding on the subject of damages the cause must be reversed. From an examination of the record it appears that there was offered at the trial evidence of a substantial nature to support the court's findings on the issues presented by the cross-complaint. The questions presented upon this phase of the case were largely as to matters of fact which are not the subject of review here.

The judgment appealed from is reversed for the reason herein stated.

PEAK v. BAUMGARTEN et al. (JOHNSON et ux., Interveners).

Civ. 8189.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California.

Sept. 28, 1932.

Rehearing Granted Oct. 28, 1932.

1. Assignments ⇐58.

Order on escrow holder to pay part of fund due drawer to another held not legal assignment thereof pro tanto, where never accepted by drawee.

2. Assignments ⇐50(1).

Order on escrow holder to pay part of fund due drawer to another operates as equitable assignment, taking precedence over subsequent assignments and judgment liens as between drawer and payee, where given for adequate consideration, with intent to effect assignment, though no fund was in escrow holder's possession at time.

3. Assignments ⇐9.

Money to become due in future on happening of contingency may be assigned.

4. Assignments ⇐55.

Advancement of price of realty to purchaser and satisfaction of latter's indebtedness to lender constituted adequate consideration for purchaser's order on escrow holder to pay amount of such advancement and indebtedness from fund due purchaser.

5. Assignments ⇐55.

Antecedent indebtedness constitutes valuable consideration sufficient to support equitable assignment.

6. Assignments ⇐137.

Evidence held to justify trial court's finding that real estate purchaser's order on escrow holder to pay another amount of purchase price advanced and other indebtedness from amount deposited by lessee was intended as assignment.

7. Assignments ⇐49.

Assignment will be held to have occurred, where it clearly appears that drawer and payee of either negotiable or nonnegotiable bill intended to transfer title to chose in action, though assignor delivered order on debtor to assignee.

8. Assignments ⇐59.

Real estate purchaser, assigning part of sum deposited by lessee in escrow to persons advancing purchase money, could not revoke assignment.

9. Assignments ⇐85, 86.

Real estate purchaser's assignment of part of sum deposited by lessee in escrow to persons advancing purchase money took precedence over subsequent assignments to, and levies of execution under judgment for, another.

10. Assignments ⇐131.

Complaint, in action for amount deposited in escrow by lessee, held to state sufficient facts to support judgment for plaintiff on theory of equitable assignment of part of fund to plaintiff by lessor.

The complaint alleged agreement of lease, deposit of lessee's check for $18,000 in escrow, assignment of $16,500 of fund to plaintiff, execution and delivery of order, directing payment thereof to plaintiff by escrow holder, contemporaneous indorsement of check, and execution of assignment and order in consideration of money advanced to lessor at his instance and request to purchase realty.

11. Assignments ⇐131.

Failure of complaint to allege that defendant's order on escrow holder to pay plaintiff part of fund was in effect when action therefor was commenced, and that plaintiff was owner and holder of assignment, held not fatal, in view of allegation that he was owner of, and entitled to possession of, sum in dispute.

12. Parties ⇐7(2).

One to whom purchaser of realty assigned part of sum, deposited in escrow by lessee, for benefit of both assignee and another, in consideration of advancement of purchase money, could sue for entire amount assigned; being trustee of express trust to extent of latter's interest (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 369).

13. Parties ⇐7(2).

Person with whom or in whose name contract is made for another's benefit is trustee of express trust, and may sue with like effect as if principal (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 369).

14. Trial ⇐397(5).

Findings by trial court as to assignment and judgment liens alleged in cross-complaint held unnecessary, in view of conclusions as to validity of previous assignment to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by E. A. William Baumgarten against the California Pacific Title & Trust Company, George Peak, and others, in which defendant Peak filed a cross-complaint against E. A. William Baumgarten and others, and Axel A. Johnson and wife intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, cross-complainant appeals.

Affirmed.

A. Don Duncan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bianchi & Hyman, of San Francisco, for interveners.

Arthur L. Shannon, of San Francisco, for respondent.

OGDEN, Justice pro tem.

This action arises out of a controversy involving several conflicting claims to a sum of $16,500 held in escrow by the defendant California Pacific Title & Trust Company, a corporation, which will for the sake of brevity be hereinafter referred to as the title company. The trial court, after deducting the expenses of escrow, awarded the entire balance of the fund to the respondent. From this judgment the defendant and cross-complainant George Peak has appealed. None of the other parties to the action below, except the interveners Johnson and wife, have appealed, and, as the appeal of the latter has been dismissed, we are concerned on this appeal only with the respective claims to the fund of the appellant and the respondent.

Respondent claims the fund as assignee thereof of the Blackmore Investment Company, a corporation. Appellant bases his claims thereto both as assignee and as a judgment creditor of the same company. Both the purported assignment and the levies of execution upon which appellant's claims are based are admittedly subsequent in point of time to the assignment claimed by respondent.

The facts in so far as they have any bearing upon the points involved in this appeal, are substantially as follows: The interveners Johnson and wife owned a vacant lot adjoining the building of the Pacific Nash Motor Company on Van Ness avenue in the city and county of San Francisco. The latter being desirous of increased building space, the following real estate transaction was promoted and consummated. The Blackmore Investment Company purchased from the Johnsons their lot for $15,000 cash, giving for the balance of the purchase price a promissory note secured by a second incumbrance upon the property, placed a building loan thereon as a first incumbrance, with the proceeds of the loan erected a building thereon, and leased the premises to the Pacific Nash Motor Company. The agreement of lease between the Blackmore Investment Company and the Pacific Nash Motor Company provided for the deposit in escrow by the lessee of the sum of $18,000 to be paid to the lessor, upon the completion and acceptance of the building and the execution of the lease, to apply on the last year's rental under the lease. Accordingly, on October 9, 1926, the Pacific Nash Motor Company deposited with the title company its check, drawn on the Wells Fargo Bank and Union Trust Company, in the sum of $18,000, payable to the order of the Blackmore Investment Company, together with instructions that the check be delivered to the latter upon the completion and acceptance of the building and the execution of the lease. Why this deposit was not made in the form of cash as required by the agreement does not appear, but apparently no objection was made to the form of the deposit.

As the transaction for the purchase of the lot was originally contemplated, the $15,000 cash payment due the Johnsons as down payment was to be derived from this deposit of $18,000. This arrangement, however, not being satisfactory to the Johnsons, who insisted upon immediate payment, it became necessary, in order that the transaction be consummated, for the Blackmore Investment Company to raise the required sum of $15,000.

The Blackmore Investment Company was a corporation, the entire capital stock of which, with the exception of a few qualifying shares, was owned by one F. P. Mozingo, who was its secretary and apparently in sole control of the affairs of the corporation. Actively participating in the promotion of the transaction was one J. L. Stewart, a licensed architect, and acting as such in the designing of the building. The respondent, Baumgarten, was employed by Stewart as a draughtsman, on a salary and commission basis, in connection with the construction.

According to the testimony of respondent, and as corroborated by that of Stewart, Mozingo explained to them both that he could not raise the $15,000 necessary to pay the Johnsons on the purchase price of the lot, and suggested that they, Stewart and Baumgarten, advance that sum to the Blackmore Investment Company for that purpose, stating that, if they would do so, he would turn over to them the deposit of the Pacific Nash Motor Company above referred to. This was thereupon agreed to, respondent giving Stewart his check for $6,000, which Stewart, in company with Mozingo, took to his bank, where he, with respondent's $6,000 check and an additional $9,000 of his own money, purchased a cashier's check in the sum of $15,000, which he gave to Mozingo. This check was deposited by Mozingo with the title company for payment to the Johnsons. At the time of agreeing to make the advance, Stewart told Mozingo that respondent wanted something in writing about the assignment of the Pacific Nash Motor Company deposit, and also that the fee of the structural engineer in connection with the construction of the building amounting to $1,500, for which he (Stewart) had become obligated, was due and should be paid. Accordingly Mozingo agreed to make the order in the amount of $16,500 to take care of both the advance and the engineering fees. Stewart further suggested to him that the order be made payable to respondent, as he was the one who wanted it.

Thereupon the following order was executed by Mozingo on behalf of the Blackmore Investment Company, one copy being delivered to the title company and the other to Stewart, who delivered it to respondent:

"San Francisco, California
"November 15, 1926.

"California Pacific Title Insurance Co., 148 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California

"Gentlemen:—For, and in consideration of certain moneys heretofore advanced to the Blackmore Investment Company, and for certain other services heretofore performed for the benefit of the Blackmore Investment Company you are herewith instructed to pay the sum of Sixteen Thousand Five Hundred ($16,500.00) Dollars to E. A. Wm. Baumgarten. This said sum of $16,500.00 is to be paid out of the deposit heretofore made with you by the Pacific Nash Motor Company to secure a lease to be entered into between the Blackmore Investment Company and the Pacific Nash Motor Company and which deposit amounts to the sum of Eighteen Thousand ($18,000.00) Dollars.

"The balance due out of the deposit of $18,000.00 namely $1,500.00 is to be paid to George Peak for services rendered in full, for negotiating the lease herein above referred to.

"It is understood, and you are hereby instructed to disregard any other orders, instructions, or demands on this said deposit of $18,000.00 without the written consent of said E. A. Wm. Baumgarten being first had and obtained.

"Yours very truly,
"Blackmore Investment Company,
"Per F. P. Mozingo, Secretary."

Thereupon, although the exact time thereof does not appear, Mozingo indorsed in blank on behalf of the Blackmore Investment Company the check on deposit with the title company.

On May 23, 1927, and again on June 13, 1927, Mozingo, on behalf of the Blackmore Investment Company, instructed the title company to cancel and disregard the above order in favor of respondent. On June 20, 1927, he directed the title company to cancel his indorsement of the check, and subsequently executed a purported assignment of the fund and check to appellant. Mozingo claimed, as his reason for doing so, that Stewart had been amply repaid for the $15,000 out of excessive and secret architect's fees received from the contractor. No sufficient evidence to support this contention was, however, produced at the trial.

The building was completed and accepted and the lease executed, and thereupon, on June 10, 1927, the title company cashed the check. Subsequently the $1,500, less the title company's charges, was paid to appellant's assignee pursuant to the second paragraph of the order. Due to the several conflicting claims to the balance of the $16,500 the title company refused to disburse it, and respondent thereupon brought this action for its recovery.

A considerable portion of appellant's briefs is devoted to a discussion of his version of the circumstances under which the advance of $15,000 was made and the order upon the title company executed and to the contention that Stewart by "padding" the contract price has been more than compensated for any advances made. Appellant's contentions as to these matters are based upon conflicting testimony at variance with that of respondent and Stewart and which upon this appeal it must be assumed were determined by the trial court adversely to appellant.

[1] The above order, being one for the payment to respondent of a part only of the whole fund due the drawer, and never having been accepted by the drawee, cannot be said to constitute a legal assignment, pro tanto, of the obligation due the Blackmore Investment Company or of any part thereof. Donohoe-Kelly Banking Co. v. S. P. Co., 138 Cal. 183, 71 P. 93, 94 Am. St. Rep. 28; Fidelity Sav., etc., Ass'n v. Rodgers, 180 Cal. 683, 182 P. 426; Guggenhime & Co. v. Lamantia, 207 Cal. 96, 276 P. 995, 997; Harlan v. Gladding, McBean & Co., 7 Cal. App. 49, 93 P. 400.

[2] However, it has been repeatedly held that, where an order, such as the one at bar, is given for a valuable and adequate consideration, and with the intent to effect an assignment, it will as between the payee and the drawer operate as an equitable assignment taking precedence over subsequent assignments and judgment liens. Wheatley v. Strobe & Wilcoxson, 12 Cal. 92, 73 Am. Dec. 522; Pierce v. Robinson, Adm'r, 13 Cal. 116; Pope v. Huth, 14 Cal. 403; Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 35, 60 P. 462; McIntyre v. Hauser, 131 Cal. 11, 63 P. 69; Fidelity Sav., etc., Ass'n v. Rodgers, supra; Dunlap v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 50 Cal. App. 476, 195 P. 688.

[3] It is immaterial that there was no fund actually in the possession of the title company at the time of the execution of the order. The subject of the assignment was not the check or any particular fund of money, but was the right of the Blackmore Investment Company to receive the sum of $18,000 upon compliance with the terms of the escrow. Money to become due at a future time upon the happening of a contingency may be the subject of an assignment. Pope v. Huth, supra; Bridge v. Kedon, 163 Cal. 493, 126 P. 149, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 404; Smitton v. McCullough, 182 Cal. 530, 189 P. 686; Bank of Yolo v. Bank of Woodland, 3 Cal. App. 561, 86 P. 820; Union Collection Co. v. Oliver, 23 Cal. App. 318, 137 P. 1082.

[4, 5] The order was given for valuable and adequate consideration, to wit, the advance of $15,000 by Stewart and respondent and the satisfaction of the indebtedness of the Blackmore Investment Company to Stewart in the sum of $1,500 on account of engineering fees. An antecedent indebtedness constitutes a valuable consideration sufficient to support an equitable assignment. Smitton v. McCullough, supra.

[6] That the order was intended by the parties as an assignment is in accord with the evidence. The agreement of Mozingo was to "turn over the deposit." At the time of the delivery of the order, Stewart said to Mozingo, "Now it is understood that $16,500 of this money goes to Baumgarten and $1500 goes to Peak," and the latter replied, "Yes, I will turn over the money to you fellows and I get the building." In January of 1927, it was suggested to respondent by an official of the title company that he procure another order on a regular form of the title company. After signing this additional order, Mozingo stated to respondent, "Now you got it all, it is all yours now." By indorsing the check, the Blackmore Investment Company divested itself of any further control over the fund. The concluding paragraph of the order specifically agrees and instructs the drawee to disregard any other orders, instructions, or demands on the fund without the written consent thereto of the payee. The trial court was amply justified in determining, as we must assume it did, that an assignment was intended.

[7] The situation at bar therefore comes within the rule as stated in Guggenhime & Co. v. Lamantia, supra, that: "Although neither a negotiable or nonnegotiable bill of itself constitutes an assignment, if it clearly appears from the entire transaction that it was the intention of the drawer and payee to transfer title to a chose in action, an assignment will be held to have taken place, and the nature of the transaction is not changed because the assignor in the course of the transaction may have delivered to the assignee an order upon the debtor."

[8, 9] An assignment having taken place, it was beyond the power of the assignor to revoke it, and Mozingo's subsequent attempts to do so were ineffectual. It likewise takes precedence over the subsequent assignments and levies of execution which form the basis of appellant's claims to the fund. Title Ins., etc., Co. v. Williamson, 18 Cal. App. 324, 123 P. 245, 247.

[10] Appellant contends that the complaint does not state, nor do the findings of the trial court find, sufficient facts to support a judgment on the theory of an equitable assignment. The complaint alleges the agreement of lease; the deposit thereunder in escrow of the check of the Pacific Nash Motor Company in the sum of $18,000; the assignment to respondent of "the sum of $16,500 of said fund of $18,000"; the execution and delivery of the order directing the payment to respondent of the sum of $16,500 and the contemporaneous indorsement of the check; and that the "assignment and order" were made in consideration of moneys advanced to the Blackmore Investment Company, at its instance and request, to be used, and which were actually used, in the purchase of the real property therein mentioned. It also contains a second count containing the usual allegations found in actions to quiet title. A general and special demurrer was filed by appellant and overruled by the trial court. Although it is true that the adequacy of the consideration is not definitely shown, there being no averment as to the amount of money advanced, the case was, as stated by appellant in his briefs, tried on the theory of an equitable assignment. The matter of the true consideration and its sufficiency and adequacy was fully gone into by all the parties, apparently without objection, upon the trial and determined to be as found by the trial court upon competent evidence, "moneys advanced and services rendered to Blackmore Investment Co., at its instance and request, of the value of $16,500." Both the evidence and the findings of fact show the assignment to be just and reasonable and the consideration therefor adequate.

The complaint is contended to be further defective, in that it alleges an assignment of "the sum of $16,500 of said fund of $18,000," whereas in fact there was at the time of the assignment no fund in existence. The trial court properly found the assignment to be of all of the assignor's "right, title and interest in and to its said claim against Pacific Nash Motor Company and the fund represented by said check, to the extent of $16,500 thereof." And this is what the complaint, reading it in its entirety, alleges in effect. From the facts alleged it definitely appears that the subject of the assignment was neither the check nor a portion of any existing fund of money, but was rather a chose in action, to wit, the claim of the Blackmore Investment Company against the Pacific Nash Motor Company.

[11] The failure of the complaint to allege that, at the time of the commencement of the action, the order was in force and effect, and the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the assignment, is not fatal. It is alleged that the plaintiff is the owner of, and entitled to possession of, the sum of money in dispute. His ownership in the assignment at the time of the commencement of the action is by "fair intendment" shown. Irish v. Sunderhaus, 122 Cal. 308, 54 P. 1113.

[12, 13] Respondent is not limited in his recovery to the sum of $6,000, which was the extent of his personal contribution to the consideration for the assignment. The Blackmore Investment Company received, for the assignment, adequate consideration of the value of $16,500. The assignment was made to respondent for the benefit of both respondent and Stewart. In so far as the extent of Stewart's interest therein is concerned, respondent is the trustee of an express trust, and entitled to sue thereon in his own name. Section 369, Code Civ. Proc. The rule that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest (section 367, Code Civ. Proc.) is subject to the further rule that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust which permits him to sue with like effect as though he were the principal. Earl Fruit Co. v. Herman, 90 Cal. App. 640, 266 P. 592.

[14] Appellant complains that the findings of the trial court fail to find on the allegations of his cross-complaint. He does not, however, point out in his briefs the issues raised thereby which are not determined in the findings, nor does he point out in what manner he has been prejudiced from any failure to find thereon. However, in view of the conclusions reached by the trial court as to the validity of the assignment in favor of respondent, admittedly prior in point of time to the alleged assignment and judgment liens upon which appellant relies, findings as to the latter became immaterial and unnecessary. 2 Cal. Jur. 1032.

The judgment is affirmed.
